Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Well, industry is simply refusing to volunteer at present, and we all know that these many contracts are all ready, but that they will not be signed because industry will not volunteer. We are told that men will not volunteer for our services in the armed forces. We say to industry, "Well, gentlemen, we will give you every assurance that the ticket will be written in a way that will be so pleasing that you will volunteer."

We say to the manpower, "If you won't volunteer we are going to draft you." As I understand it, we are saying both of these things in the name of democracy. I would like to have the gentleman comment on the differences between industry or capital in a democracy and manpower.

Mr. MILLER. For the purpose of this argument, there is no difference.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. Is it not a fact that the limitation on profits in the Vinson-Trammell bill is 10 percent on naval ships and 12 percent on airplanes?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; gross.

Mr. HEALEY. Does the gentleman think that limitation is proving to be a serious obstacle in the way of business going forward and accepting these contracts?

Mr. MILLER. I do not want to go back over it, but before the gentleman came in I read the testimony of Admiral Towers and referred to the testimony of General Brett, pointing out that it was the subcontractors who come under this Vinson-Trammell Act, who are not willing to accept these contracts, and therefore they cannot get the castings and the parts they need.

Mr. HEALEY. And they allege that because of that condition it causes a serious deterrent to the going forward with the defense program?

Mr. MILLER. No. I think I pointed out it was not the question of profits, because that industry and every other knows that they will not be allowed to make any excessive profits. As the gentleman knows, there is a lot more to the Vinson-Trammell Act than the matter of profits.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman know at this point just exactly what the final provisions of the Burke-Wadsworth bill will be?

Mr. MILLER. No; I just said that I could not say I would vote for it, because nobody knows yet what it will contain when it finally reaches this House.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is there anybody who can honestly say he is for or against the bill until he knows what is in the bill?

Mr. MILLER. I do not see how he can.

I want to close with the thought that I expressed at the very beginning, that the thing most essential now is to have the confidence of the people, and that everything we pass through this Congress be explained to them. If a bill is passed and word is sent out that this is a bill to give a year's training for the National Guard, let it be that and nothing more. The resolution in the other body and which the country understands is a bill to give the National Guard a year's training, is a whole lot more than that. A simple reading of the bill will convince any Member of the House that it is more than that.

Mr. HOUSTON. I recall the Army Chief of Staff or someone in high authority stating that the 375,000 authorized men were coming in and would be enlisted by December 1. How long would it take to get the equipment they are talking about for a big Navy and all this mechanized equipment? It would take a great deal longer than that, would it not?

Mr. MILLER. As a matter of fact, we have well in excess of the 375,000 men now and they do have the equipment.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then why not wait until December 1, and if they have fallen down on the volunteer system, then we can invoke this conscription.

Mr. MILLER. That is all right for the needed protective force.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. SECCOMBE. The gentleman will agree that there were some 50,000 enlisted in a short period of time recently. I think that proved that if the average young man is given an opportunity to enlist, and knows that, according to the President's promise, he will not be sent to foreign soil, there would be a general volunteer enlistment, with the thought in mind to protect American shores.

The gentleman will agree, however, that the enlistment today is in the aviation service, and we have now far exceeded the planes we have to train the men.

Mr. MILLER. The number of men enlisting far exceed the number of planes with which to train them.

Mr. SECCOMBE. That is in aviation.

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. The gentleman is well informed on the subject on which he is speaking. Could he tell the House the number of voluntary enlistments up to the time of the draft in 1917?

Mr. MILLER. I do not know the exact number, but I heard it said recently that approximately a million men enlisted before the draft.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does not the gentleman believe we should give the voluntary-enlistment boys a chance to enlist before we put conscription into effect?

Mr. MILLER. I do. Enactment of the Burke-Wadsworth bill would not prevent further enlistments. And I think, further, that the Congress must determine very soon just what we are building up this army for. I think we should have that explained to us first. Is the force going to be used to police every republic of South America? If so, we shall need an army 20 times the size we have in mind. If it is to be purely a protective, defensive force, then the original testimony of General Marshall that the protective force should be about 375,000 men should be the answer, unless there is information of threats that we as Members of Congress do not know about.

Mr. HOUSTON. We do not expect the State Department to turn all their information over to us, but we should make sure there is justification for it.

Mr. MILLER. I think the one thing the young men of the country want to know is the nature of the defense. I went home 2 weeks ago to take part in a discussion on this subject, and that was the thought these young fellows expressed, particularly after the meeting was over: "Where is the threat coming from? Do you think war is imminent?" And I could not honestly tell them that I thought war was imminent. Then they said, "If war is not imminent, why must we have conscription?" This thing is going to develop into a guessing game as to whether or not war is imminent. The question of whether a patriotic young man will enlist is going to be a guessing game; he is going to sit back and try to guess whether war is imminent. We as a Congress should be in position to give them that information. [Applause.]

SPECIAL ORDERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this opportunity because of two instances which have recently been brought to my attention of what, on their face, appear to be further examples of inefficiency and waste on the part of the Works Progress Administration and because I have been asked to bring these instances to the attention of the Congress and the country.

The first instance is in Massachusetts in connection with a project near New Bedford, which apparently contemplates the conversion of some 5 miles of fire lanes in thickly wooded territory under the jurisdiction of the New Bedford water department into macadam roads upon which there can be no conceivable travel, the construction of which will necessitate further clearing and plowing of earth to provide material for extinguishing fires at a rate of about $14,000 per mile. The project appears to have been started without proper sponsorship.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include at this point the following article appearing on August 3, 1940, in the New Bedford Standard Times:

STATE W. P. A. INVESTIGATES NEW BEDFORD ROAD JOB

BOSTON, August 3.—Charges that Federal and city funds are being wasted on the New Bedford watershed road improvement project are being investigated upon complaint of Howard C. Mandell, chief engineer of the New Bedford Water Department, State W. P. A. Administrator Denis Delaney said today.

Mr. Mandell also charged in his letter to Mr. Delaney that "there appears to be a vital omission in the legal authorization of the project."

Although project specifications show the New Bedford Planning Board approved the watershed-roads project, Chairman Joseph Eccleston, of the planning board, states in a letter accompanying the Mandell complaint that the planning board never "approved, considered, or discussed" the work as far as the chairman knows.

FIRE LANES EXPLAINED

Mr. Mandell limits his charge of wasted funds to that section of watershed-road improvements which intends to pave 25,200 lineal feet of fire lanes.

"The purpose of these fire lanes was twofold," Mr. Mandell's letter to Mr. Delaney states. "First, to provide a fire stop so that fires originating beside the public highway would not readily spread to the forested areas; and second, to provide handy reservoirs of soft earth with which to fight fires once started.

"The fire lanes are about 20 feet wide, located on water-works property beside and parallel to public highways, and are inaccessible to the public by reason of natural barriers, fences, and locked gates.

"How can anyone justify the expenditure of $14,000 per mile for roads upon which there can conceivably be no travel whatever and which, by occupying present areas of plowed ground, will necessitate the clearing and plowing of new adjacent strips of earth to provide material for the extinguishment of fires?"

CHAIRMAN DENIES APPROVAL

Mr. Eccleston's letter stated:

"This is to inform you that as chairman and presiding officer of the New Bedford Planning Board I have no knowledge that the board has ever approved, considered, or discussed a certain W. P. A. project known as Mass. 20406, covering the construction of certain roads on lands under the jurisdiction of the New Bedford waterworks. The planning board has no jurisdiction whatever over the watershed."

Mr. Mandell's letter explained that he had been assigned by Edward T. Hodson, sponsor's representative, to supervise the fire lane paving project. This project had been discussed with him and Stephen H. Taylor, former superintendent of the water department, before the project was prepared, Mr. Mandell wrote, and paving the fire lanes was then pronounced by them as "unnecessary, unjustifiable, and unwise."

Project specifications show that paving the 25,200 feet of fire lanes would cost New Bedford $31,321 and the Federal Government $38,805, a total of $70,126. Of the city share, $9,860 would be spent for bus hire to transport workers and $8,635 for trucks to haul materials, a total of $18,495 for trucks and busses.

Justification for the fire-lane paving, as given in the project specifications, is "jumbled," Mr. Mandell's letter charges.

This justification reads:

"The city of New Bedford, in order to obtain clear title to certain properties at the watershed, had to grant life leases to property owners, some of whom are still residing there. Use of these properties by the owners increases the fire hazards, especially during the spring thaws which result in deep ruts in the roads which are the only means of access to large areas of the watershed bordering city-owned ponds.

"They must be kept open to permit the waterworks apparatus and watershed patrol to reach these vital sections. Should a fire start at one of these leased properties, severe damage would certainly result to city-owned property."

CITY OFFICIALS DECLINE TO COMMENT

Gilbert J. Francis, W. P. A. coordinator, Commissioner Edward T. Hodson of the Department of Public Works, and James F. McKenna, secretary to Mayor Carney, declined to comment on the complaint brought by Mr. Mandell, and all disclaimed any knowledge that an investigation was under way today.

I hold in my hand a letter received in this connection from Mr. Howard C. Mandell, chief engineer of the New Bedford water department, from which I quote in part as follows:

The patent absurdity of that part of the project which contemplates the replacement of about 5 miles of plowed fire lanes with broken stretches of macadam road which start nowhere and end similarly and are not open to the public is proof positive of the incompetence and ineptitude of the local administrator's office.

* * * This project was proposed by the local administrator in spite of the strongest possible condemnation by qualified and experienced officials of the waterworks and without the sponsorship or approval of the water board in which is vested all legal jurisdiction. The arbitrary assumption by others of power to make changes in the property which vitally oppose the long-term policies of the water board, without even consulting the board, is an unwarranted violation of the authority duly invested in the board by State legislation and city ordinances.

The fact that this improperly authorized infantile fantasy passed the presumptive examinations of the W. P. A. to the point of receiving Presidential approval must be accepted as strong evidence that such examinations are valueless, and that anything goes.

It is generally considered good policy, from the local point of view, to secure as much Federal money as possible with the least expenditure of local money, the former being blindly accepted as manna from Heaven. The fire lane proposal, however, does not conform with the accepted policy, because the local contribution is almost as large as the Federal share. The explanation of this seeming paradox lies in the fact that the larger part of the city funds is to be expended for the hire of private trucks and busses under patronage. This item was given more consideration in the preparation and submission of the project than any humanitarian or utilitarian objectives.

The State W. P. A. examiners probably accepted this proposal at face value because the unusually large proportion of sponsor's funds was deemed to indicate an exceptionally desirable project. The examination must have been of the most cursory nature.

* * * I am disturbed by the possibility that our local case is but a typical example of the national exploitation of W. P. A.

* * * It is my suggestion that, whether * * * this particular project (is halted) or not, the abuses of the system be forcefully called to the attention of the general public by press releases and appropriate action from your office.

The facts, if substantiated, speak for themselves and are, of course, in line with many similar situations which have been brought to light in other parts of the country.

The second instance, Mr. Speaker, is in Los Angeles and is covered in three newspaper stories appearing recently in Los Angeles Times.

The first article, alleging wholesale destruction and consignment to the Imperial Boulevard dump of vast quantities of W. P. A. clothing and equipment, I include under leave to extend my remarks at this point:

W. P. A. WASTE DISCOVERED—SLASHED BOOTS, SLICKERS, AND OTHER SUPPLIES FOUND ON DUMP PILE

Evidence of wholesale destruction of vast quantities of clothing and equipment bearing labels of the W. P. A.—most of which was in good condition—was discovered last night by the Times at an Imperial Boulevard dump.

Hundreds of rubber boots which had been slashed with a knife or ax, together with heavy garbage cans, buckets, chopped-up sections of nearly new rubber hose have been delivered there by trucks to be dumped and ultimately burned.

The deliveries have been made during the last 2 weeks, according to E. P. Shoemaker, owner of the dumping grounds.

Dozens of buckets, galvanized iron garbage cans, and smaller metal containers—each rendered useless by holes driven through by a pick—were disposed of. Each bears the small metal tag identifying it as W. P. A. property.

In some cases the items were so new and had seen so little actual service that the original manufacturer's paper label was still in evidence.

There were hip boots on which the sole tread was virtually unused and yellow slickers from which the original gloss had not been worn.

On the back of each of the raincoats was blocked in large letters, "W. P. A."

But deft strokes of a sharp knife or razor blade, it was observed, had cut them into a condition of utter uselessness.

The bottoms of 15 26-inch-high iron cans which, it was apparent, had seen but little wear, were punched with pick holes. Shoemaker said that the wholesale value of each when new approximated $2.

NEW PICK HANDLES DUMPED

The owner said that 2 weeks ago the truck delivered 300 pick handles to a large pile of refuse which was to be burned later in the afternoon. Shoemaker asserted that he had salvaged several dozen which were apparently brand new.

It is understood that the loads are sent from a supply warehouse of the Government agency.

The second article, entitled "W. P. A. Officials Explain 'Junking' as Easier Way. Cheaper to Buy New Materials Than Repair Old, Their Excuse for Dumping," contains the following statements, among others:

E. P. Shoemaker, owner of the dump, who has made a business of salvaging for many years, kept two men busy yesterday soldering the large pick-driven holes in nearly a score of buckets which had been tossed away. * * *

Workmen or employees of the W. P. A. are not permitted to carry boots or raincoats home, it was asserted, under Government regulation. Shoemaker, on the other hand, is given free rein to repair and sell what he may.

* * * Shoemaker said that 2 years ago 2 barrelfuls of pick handles, some of which had never been used, were delivered to his dump to be "burned immediately." Each handle, Shoemaker said, bore the W. P. A. stamp, and instead of burning them, as the driver of a Government truck had instructed him to do, he saved them, giving some away, selling others.

I include the article at this point.

W. P. A. OFFICIALS EXPLAIN "JUNKING" AS EASIER WAY—CHEAPER TO BUY NEW MATERIALS THAN REPAIR OLD, THEIR EXCUSE FOR DUMPING

The discovery by the Times of the "junking" of slightly used clothing and supplies by the W. P. A. because "it's easier to buy new materials than make repairs," yesterday brought forth the following revelations from spokesmen of the Government agency:

1. "When," said Herbert C. Legg, southern California administrator, "the W. P. A. uses buckets to carry paste or powdery scenery paint, their usefulness is immediately nullified and they are discarded. The W. P. A. never washes out the remains in the bottom so that they can be used again."

TORN RAINCOATS

2. "When a raincoat is found to have a slight rent," said R. P. Franck, State property custodian, "we feel it is easier and more economical to buy new ones than to attempt to make repairs." His assistant, T. W. Aungst, added that the W. P. A. would be unable to make such repairs, because the W. P. A. has no facilities for such things.

3. If a workman's hip-high heavy rubber boots are discovered to have a small crack in the material, the W. P. A. immediately sends for a new pair for him, for the W. P. A. never lets its workmen get their feet wet.

CANS USED ONCE

4. The W. P. A. uses large heavy galvanized iron garbage cans on many of its jobs as latrines. But when the cans, which were found on an Imperial Boulevard dump Monday night, together with hundreds of other items, have been used on one project, regardless of their time of service, they are immediately classified as "junk," according to Aungst, and disposed of as quickly as possible. "Some folks might put drinking water in them."

5. If sections of new rubber hose were discovered on this dump, says Legg, "some politician must have planted them there."

LEGG SATISFIED

Legg said yesterday that he was satisfied with the explanation of the matter as brought him early yesterday by a half dozen assistants of various capacities. Legg further satisfied himself that there was "absolutely nothing salvable at the dump" by making an early morning visit there.

"I have just visited the dump," he said in an official statement, "and examined such materials as bore the W. P. A. stamp. All the stuff there is beyond economical repair. As to salvage, no junk dealer would bid anything for it."

However, E. P. Shoemaker, owner of the dump, who has made a business of salvaging for many years, kept two men busy yesterday soldering the large pick-driven holes in nearly a score of buckets which had been tossed away.

AX AND PICK MARKS

Each bucket and galvanized iron container is carefully given the mark of the pick, and raincoats and rubber boots are slashed with an ax, said Franck, to emphasize their classification by the W. P. A. officially as junk.

Workmen or employees of the W. P. A. are not permitted to carry such boots or raincoats home, it was asserted, under Government regulation.

Shoemaker, on the other hand, is given free rein to repair and sell what he may, Franck said.

BEFORE BOARD

Legg said that at the conclusion of a project, all materials are brought before a three-man survey board consisting of a representative each from the supply, operations, and finance divisions of the agency. They pass on whether the materials are to be consigned to the junk heap, the warehouse, or if bids are taken on them for salvage.

Much of the vast quantity of goods discovered Monday night on the dump, which had been labeled "junk" by this three-man commission, appeared to be in virtually new condition, Shoemaker said.

NEW PICK HANDLES

Shoemaker said that 2 years ago two barrels full of pickhandles, some of which had never been used, were delivered to his dump to be "burned immediately."

Each handle, Shoemaker said, bore the W. P. A. stamp, and instead of burning them, as the driver of a Government truck had instructed him to do, he saved them, giving some away, selling others.

The third article, entitled "Yes, Yes, Mr. Legg, But—" includes the following editorial comment:

It is very apparent that these costly Government materials were purposely rendered useless. However, why worry about it? It's only taxpayer's money. The W. P. A. has never bothered about such minor considerations.

I include the article at this point:

YES, YES, MR. LEGG, BUT—

Herbert C. Legg, W. P. A. Administrator for this district, denies that any usable or salvageable materials were thrown on a dump on Imperial Boulevard. He inspected the slashed rubber coats, the cut-up fire hose, the razored boots, and the big galvanized garbage cans full of pick holes, and said they were useless.

No doubt they are; but how did they get that way? It is a point on which Mr. Legg throws no light. These holes and slashes do not indicate ordinary wear and tear; quite the contrary. Some of the cans are so new they still have the paper labels on them. Mr. Legg's ideas of economical salvage differ from those of the Salvation Army, Goodwill Industries, and similar organizations, to all appearances.

The garbage cans, he said, had been rendered insanitary. Any galvanized-iron container, no matter what it has been used for, can be completely and thoroughly sterilized in a short time by simple methods. Hosing out and exposure to the sun do the trick if no other sterilizing agents are handy. It is very apparent that these costly Government materials were purposely rendered useless.

However, why worry about it? It's only taxpayers' money The W. P. A. has never bothered about such minor considerations.

I, of course, have no personal knowledge, Mr. Speaker, of the facts alleged in either instance. They have been brought to my attention by persons whose testimony should be reliable. They appear to evidence continuing inefficiency and waste, serving to deprive those in need of funds appropriated by Congress for their relief.

I trust that the W. P. A. will investigate both matters thoroughly and deal with them as they deserve to be dealt with.

Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

Mr. VANDENBERG presented memorials numerously signed by sundry citizens of the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of compulsory military-training legislation, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a petition which is being circulated by Mr. G. Allison Phelps, an author and radio commentator, of Hollywood, Calif., and ask that it be published in the RECORD under the head of "Petitions and memorials."

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Defend America by preserving America's laws, principles, and products, and by aiding Americans—A petition of patriotic American citizens]

AMERICA FOR AMERICANS

Our forefathers fought, and thousands died, to win independence from European bigotry, intolerance, and oppression, and to establish the United States of America as an independent Republic, the affairs of which would be of, by, and for a free people. Since then the United States never has been dependent upon the rise or fall of any foreign power, and it is not now.

However, there are those in America who are afflicted with the European complex, whose patriotism has been demoralized by the clever propaganda of the agents of foreign nations, and who are showing excessive partiality for some foreign nations and excessive hatred of others, attitudes against which George Washington, the Father of our Country, warned us. These demoralized people are assisting foreign agents and alien propagandists in an attempt to destroy our independence and our peace by forcing us to interweave our destiny with the destinies of Old World, crumbling, European empires, whose leaders endeavor continuously to involve this independent democracy in their—quote from George Washington—"frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns."

If we are to preserve our American freedom, independence, and peace in our New World, we must not make the mistake again of becoming involved in another of Europe's outbursts of mass murder and destruction in the Old World. We must take care of our own unemployed, destitute, afflicted men and women, and of our own underprivileged and undernourished boys and girls. We must remain free of the toils of European intrigue, deception, treachery, and dishonesty, and uncontaminated by Europe's royalist class distinctions and racial and religious hatreds.

Therefore in order that we may remain at peace with each and all of the nations of the world, in order that America may be preserved as an independent nation, and our force, energy, and intellect be concentrated in America to further the interests of America and to create prosperity for the people of America, the undersigned citizens of the United States request the President and the Congress of the United States—

1. To keep in the possession of our Army and Navy all materials of war as our major forces of defense are developed to a point of impregnability, that such forces shall not be weakened even to the slightest degree.

2. To expand our industrial facilities immediately in order to rapidly produce airplanes, ships, tanks, guns, etc., to be used entirely for American national defense.

3. To use only American citizens in American industry, and to exclude all aliens from jobs needed by our millions of unemployed American citizens.

4. To suspend no immigration quotas, to tighten our immigration laws, and to see that they are strictly enforced, in order to protect the United States from further invasions of foreign refugees of all ages, races, and classes from all foreign lands.

5. To distribute any surplus food supplies America may have at the present time, or in the future, among America's unemployed, destitute citizens for the benefit of America's undernourished men, women, and children.

6. To refuse to repeal at the solicitation of European agents and propagandists, or foreign sympathizers, our law which prohibits Americans from volunteering in the armies of foreign powers.

ACTIVE SERVICE OF NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVE, AND RETIRED PERSONNEL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of Reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire now to submit a unanimous-consent request prior to the calling of the roll, as required under the rule. I ask unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. today the Senate proceed to vote on the pending joint resolution and all amendments thereto, and I make the point of no quorum under the rule so that Members may be called into the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are necessarily absent from the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BARKLEY. I renew my request for unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. today the Senate proceed to vote on the pending joint resolution and all amendments thereto without further debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from Kentucky made prior to the calling of the roll. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as I stated last evening, under the modification now presented I will have no objection.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I inquire whether under the limitation now proposed one Senator could hold the floor from now until 4 o'clock?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is a 20-minute limitation on debate on the joint resolution and each amendment thereto. No Senator can speak longer than 40 minutes and no Senator who has spoken on the joint resolution can speak for longer than 20 minutes.

Mr. LODGE. I desire about 5 minutes on the joint resolution.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am sure the Senator will have no difficulty in securing the time he desires.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I do not want to object to the unanimous-consent request, but I desire to point out that under the proposed agreement the entire time could be taken up by one single Member.

Mr. BARKLEY. Theoretically, that might be true, but practically I think the Senator need have no fear on that score. I think we will probably reach a vote on the pending amendment after another speech or two. Then, until 4 o'clock, other amendments may be offered and discussed.

Mr. BARBOUR. As I have said, I do not want or, in fact, intend to interpose an objection; but I certainly do want to point out that there are a number of amendments to be offered; and if we are going to continue at the same rate of progress, or rather lack of progress, that has been evidenced during the last day or two, it is easy to conceive that two or three amendments might take the whole afternoon, and remaining amendments would go by the board without any chance of explanation or adoption.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that I hope the matters which have retarded our progress will soon be gotten out of the way.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. I apprehend that, due to the fact that so much time has been taken in the discussion of one or two amendments—and I think there have been only two amendments disposed of outside of the committee amendments—it might be better to ask unanimous consent that there be a shorter time limit on the discussion of amendments than to request that a vote be taken at a certain hour. Otherwise a good many amendments may be offered without opportunity for explanation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, that is a risk we always take when we try to fix a time for a final vote on a measure; but during the next 4 hours, while I do not know how many amendments will be offered, I do not think there will be any difficulty about the Senator having an opportunity to discuss his amendment. If he thought the time was running short, he might have it read for the information of the Senate and discuss it, even though the Senate had under consideration another amendment, so that it might be understood when voted upon.

Mr. OVERTON. May I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that he ask unanimous consent that no Senator be allowed to speak more than 10 minutes on any amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. I would rather not have the two requests come together. If I can get an agreement to the request I have made, I will say to the Senator that should it develop that there may be a lack of time, I will make a request for a further limitation of debate on amendments and on the joint resolution.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to make a statement, and ask the majority floor leader what the situation would be in a certain contingency.

Yesterday the Danaher amendment was defeated. I voted against that amendment. During this morning some circumstances have come to my knowledge which may compel me to make a motion to reconsider the vote on that amendment, which was defeated. Under the proposal of the Senator from Kentucky, would I be precluded from making such a motion?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; there is no preclusion of making a motion, but when the hour of 4 o'clock arrives, under the unanimous-consent request I have made, all amendments and motions will be voted upon without further debate.

Mr. HATCH. I have no objection to the time limit, but I want the word "motion" specifically included, so that if I determine that I want to move to reconsider the Danaher amendment, I shall have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that there is no question that he would have that right anyway, but I am willing to modify my request by proposing that at 4 o'clock p. m., under the request I have made, the Senate proceed to vote without further debate on the joint resolution and all amendments and motions pertaining thereto.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I thought the proposal was not later than 4 o'clock p. m.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not later than 4 o'clock p. m., that is true.

Mr. McNARY. So it is not 4 o'clock, it is whenever debate subsides?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, there is another possible situation that might develop, and which I want to have made clear. Suppose I should move to reconsider the amendment to which I have referred, and the motion should be carried, and the hour of 4 o'clock should arrive. Then a vote could not be had on the amendment, could it?

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes. If the motion should be carried, and the vote by which the amendment was rejected should be reconsidered, of course, the amendment would come back before the Senate, and would be voted on at 4 o'clock, with other amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the modified request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to inquire what time I have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Senator has 17 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, when the Senate recessed last evening I was endeavoring to reply to the contention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] about the power of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. My contention is that, under the language of the Constitution giving the President power as Commander in Chief, that power resides in the President in time of peace as well as in time of war. I do not contend that the President has, we will say, the moral right to send an army of the United States into a peaceful country and conquer it without any declaration of war by Congress, but I do contend that, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the President, and the President alone, has power to direct the movements of the Army as to where it shall go, both in peace and in war.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that I do not think there is any real difference of viewpoint between his position and mine. Of course, the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, has the power. Of course, however, that would not warrant an abuse of the power.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no.

Mr. GEORGE. That was the only point I was making so far as peacetime operations are concerned.

Mr. CONNALLY. I had gotten the idea that the Senator from Georgia was contending that the President had no right to send the Army outside the territorial limits of the United States unless the Congress made a specific declaration of war.

In that connection I remind the Senator from Georgia that in 1918, I believe, the President of the United States sent an army to Siberia, into Russian territory. We were not at war with Russia. We had made no declaration of hostility against Russia. She was allied with us at the beginning of the war; and yet, because of the military situation, the President of the United States sent a division of troops into Siberia, and they occupied Vladivostok for a considerable period. They were in command of Major General Graves, of the United States Army. They remained there for more than a year, as I now recall, well into 1919.

The President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army, also sent an army to the European side of Russia, at Archangel, and they prosecuted a campaign. Many of our men were killed in that campaign. I remember that one boy from my own district was killed in the Archangel expedition. We were not at war with Russia. There was no declaration of war; but the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army, sent those forces to those points; and, so far as I recall, there was no outburst in Congress and no declaration challenging the power and authority of the President of the United States.

I recall that in 1916, I believe, when Villa invaded New Mexico or Arizona, the President of the United States sent General Pershing and an army into Mexico without a declaration of war, on the theory, of course, that they had a right to continue the pursuit of invaders and marauders until they apprehended them, no matter where that apprehension might take place.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wish to suggest that that was on the theory that Villa did not represent the Government of Mexico, but was a mere outlaw.

Mr. CONNALLY. The result would have been the same if he had represented the Government of Mexico. If the Government of Mexico sends an army and attacks the United States, we have a right to chase it back.

Mr. HATCH. Does not the Senator make a distinction between pursuing an outlaw across the border and sending an army to attack the established form of government of a country?

Mr. CONNALLY. I certainly do; but, at the same time, in pursuing that outlaw we went into the territory of a neighboring nation without a declaration of war, and a number of persons in Mexico protested against it; but the President, as Commander in Chief, sent the Army there because he had a right to say where the Army should go.

I am not approving what happened in all these cases; but I am saying that under the Constitution of the United States the President is Commander in Chief of the Army, not part of the time, but all the time; not of a part of the Army, but of all of the Army. He has the power. If we do not want a President to abuse that power, we ought not to elect a President who will abuse it.

Mr. President, I shall not weary the Senate with constitutional quotations and court decisions; but I hold in my hand a copy of the Federalist. Therein, in an article by Mr. Hamilton, he clearly points out the authority which is given to the President of the United States as Commander in Chief.

He differentiates between the power vested in the President and that vested in the British monarch. He shows that under the British Constitution the King may declare war. Of course, under our Constitution the President may not declare war.

I readily agree that the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army, if he should so desire, by invading another country or by sending the Navy to another country and making a demonstration, could put the United States in such a position that we could not well recede from a state of war; but that is simply one of the incidents of power. Any power may be abused. Congress may pass a fool law, but that does not mean that Congress should be divested of the power to pass laws. I think we could convict the Congress in any court in the land of having passed fool laws, but that is no reason why we should take away from Congress the power to enact laws.

Let me say a further word, and then I shall conclude.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I do not want to trespass on the Senator's time if his time is limited.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is limited.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I should like to ask the Senator if, in his opinion, under the proviso on page 2 of the joint resolution providing that the members and units of the Reserve components of the Army of the United States ordered into active Federal service shall not be employed beyond the limits of the Western Hemisphere, and so forth, the President is given any power over the National Guard when it is ordered into active Federal service that he does not have over the Regular Army of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. No additional power whatsoever?

Mr. CONNALLY. I think not. Under the constitutional provision, when the National Guard is called into the Federal service, the President becomes the commander in chief of the guard to the same extent that he is already the Commander in Chief of the Regular Army and Navy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Then, if that whole proviso were stricken from the joint resolution and nothing at all were said about it, the President would have the same power under the Constitution that he would have under this proviso, except as to its limitations to the Western Hemisphere, and so forth?

Mr. CONNALLY. I should say so. The Senator refers, no doubt, to the proviso on page 2:

Provided, That the members and units of the Reserve components of the Army of the United States ordered into active Federal service under this authority shall not be employed beyond the limits of the Western Hemisphere.

That is a limitation upon the authority of the President, and if it were all stricken out the President would still have the same power he now has under the Constitution to order these troops anywhere he desired to send them.

The Senator from Georgia yesterday charged that President Polk had sent an army clearly beyond the limits of the United States. I know the Senator made the statement in good faith, but I wish to say to him that he is in error. The two battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma occurred on the north side of the Rio Grande. There was a contention by the Mexican Government that the true boundary between Mexico and Texas was the Nueces River, but Texas always contended that the boundary was the Rio Grande, and undertook to enforce its claim with arms.

In 1842 two Mexican armies invaded Texas and in each instance captured a city. They captured the city of San Antonio, but as soon as the Texas army was rallied the Mexicans retreated beyond the Rio Grande. So when President Polk sent the army of General Taylor to the vicinity of the Rio Grande, near Brownsville, Tex., he was occupying territory which Texas claimed and had always claimed as her territory. Of course, when Texas joined the Union she contended that her boundary extended to the Rio Grande. Therefore President Polk was not violating any alien territory when he sent the Army to that point.

Of course, it might be charged that President Polk might have known that as a result of his sending the Army to that vicinity inevitably there would be a clash with the Mexican Army. The Mexican Army crossed the Rio Grande and attacked Taylor north of the Rio Grande at these two points—Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma. I have been on those battlefields—subsequent to the battles, of course, and in time of peace. [Laughter.] I know the location of the battlefields, and I know that they are north of the Rio Grande, so that there was nothing improper in President Polk's ordering Taylor's army to that vicinity in that particular instance.

The President of the United States, as Commander in Chief, has also on numerous occasions sent marines to Central and South America. The marines occupied Haiti for a period of years. I do not approve of the general doctrine of policing Central and South America, but the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, did send marines to Haiti. The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] knows about it because the commander of the United States marines, General Russell, would not let him land in Haiti. He declined to let the Senator from Utah go to Haiti. [Laughter.] General Russell denied it, but the Senator from Utah averred that he was denied access to Haiti on one occasion. I think General Russell did the Senator a favor in not letting him go to Haiti, but still that is what he did. [Laughter.]

The President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, has also sent marines to Nicaragua on several occasions. During the Boxer Rebellion in China, in 1900, the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, sent an expedition to China. We were not at war with China, and never declared war, but the President had a right to send the armed forces wherever the interests of the United States and of American citizens were involved.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. The limitation to which the Senator refers would prevent the President from sending the guard to China.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. ADAMS. Would the Senator like to have the limitation removed so that the whole globe would be subject to this jurisdiction of the President?

Mr. CONNALLY. What is that?

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator's argument would suggest that we remove this limitation so that the President would be permitted to send troops to China or anywhere else.

Mr. CONNALLY. As I understand the Senator's motion, we could not send troops to Venezuela.

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct as to the National Guard.

Mr. CONNALLY. Congress some time ago by a solemn declaration restated the Monroe Doctrine and told the world that we would not permit the transfer of any territory in the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another. That is the law. We have declared it by a solemn statute. The President of the United States is given a solemn injunction to see that the laws of the United States are enforced, and one way to enforce them is by giving him an army and a navy. Suppose some European power, or some Asiatic power, should next year or next month send an army to a South American country and conquer it. Would the Senator from Colorado be in favor of our remaining quiet, and doing nothing about it?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I am not sure as to the accuracy of the learned and able Senator's terminology when he says that the resolution which was adopted as to the Monroe Doctrine is the law. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States can pass a law providing that one foreign nation may not transfer the title to its property to another.

Mr. CONNALLY. We can if we have a stick big enough.

Mr. ADAMS. It would not be the law.

Mr. CONNALLY. It would be the law of might, and that is what is now ruling the world.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator would not want to make war upon any nation which violated any portion of this very elaborate declaration which was passed by the Congress, but was not signed by the President, and therefore is not the law.

Mr. CONNALLY. It has not been signed? The act has not been signed yet? I do not know whether or not it has been signed; but I will say to the Senator that whether it has been signed or not, I think so much of the Monroe Doctrine that if a European power should undertake to conquer any country in South or Central America I would be in favor of sending the Army and Navy down there and putting them out; if that answers the question. That is the attitude of the Senator from Texas.

What did we do with regard to Mexico in 1867? We had been involved in a terrible and tragic War between the States. Napoleon III had sent his Emperor Maximilian to Mexico, and he had conquered the country and was on the throne. But in 1867, when we had, temporarily, at least, settled our own troubles at home, the President of the United States served notice on Napoleon III that he would have to get out of Mexico, and old Napoleon III took his army and went back to Europe, and left Maximilian as the victim, to suffer death as a punishment for his inordinate ambition. That is what we did in Mexico. What right had we to do it except our right under the Monroe Doctrine?

I wish to say to the Senator from Georgia, whom I have always very greatly admired, and who is a learned lawyer, that when his father and my father were bivouacked yonder at Appomattox, and upon the other battlefields of the South, there emerged from those battlefields a nation. There cannot be 48 States any longer, each State running its own army and its own navy. There emerged from the battlefields of the War between the States a nation, and the Army and Navy of the United States have been created to serve the Nation, and they are to be commanded by the Nation. Under the power to raise armies the Congress of the United States has plenary authority to raise an army or a navy by any means it may see fit to employ. Of course, it should always employ methods of impartiality and fairness, but we can draft armies in time of peace as well as in time of war.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I agree fully with the statement of the Senator from Texas with reference to the Monroe Doctrine. I think he has the right conception of it. I think it was the Monroe Doctrine which made this Government threaten to send an army into Mexico to get the French out of that country. The only complaint the South American or Latin-American countries have as to the Monroe Doctrine is that, notwithstanding the fact that the Monroe Doctrine was in existence, the United States did not do a thing at the time England took over British Honduras, and at the time England took over the Falkland Islands, while the Monroe Doctrine was in existence. I think the Senator's conception of the Monroe Doctrine is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator for his interruption. His charge may be true, but it was not true as to the conduct of the United States in the case of Venezuela and her boundary dispute with England. Mr. Olney, the Secretary of State, and President Cleveland, thrilled the world by the restatement of the Monroe Doctrine. President Cleveland indicated to Great Britain very clearly that if they insisted upon sending their navy and armed forces to Venezuela they would meet the armed forces of the United States of America.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Texas has expired.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE GIBBS, OF GEORGIA

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. W. BEN GIBBS, late a Representative from the State of Georgia, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The message announced that the Speaker had appointed Mr. BROWN of Georgia, Mr. PETERSON of Georgia, Mr. PACE, and Mr. CAMP a committee of the House to be joined with such Members of the Senate as may be appointed to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask that the resolutions of the House be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives, which were read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
August 8, 1940.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. W. BEN GIBBS, a Representative from the State of Georgia.

Resolved, That a committee of four Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. RUSSELL] and myself, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 294) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. W. BEN GIBBS, late a Representatives from the State of Georgia.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, take a recess until 12 o'clock m. tomorrow.

Under the second resolving clause, the President pro tempore appointed the Senators from Georgia (Mr. GEORGE and Mr. RUSSELL) the committee to join the committee on the part of the House to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

ACTIVE SERVICE OF NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVE, AND RETIRED PERSONNEL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of Reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to make a few brief observations concerning the pending amendment.

I agree fully with the Senator from Texas in his interpretation of the authority of the President in regard to control of the movements of our armed forces. The Senator from Texas yesterday referred to that provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress—

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States—

And so forth. What is the militia?

The militia of the United States shall consist of all able-bodied male citizens of the United States and all other able-bodied males who have or shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, who shall be more than 18 years of age and, except as hereinafter provided, not more than 45 years of age; and said militia shall be divided into three classes, the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and the unorganized militia.

So every able-bodied man between 18 and 45 who is a citizen of the United States, or who has declared his intention to become a citizen, is a part of the militia of the United States, and under the law that militia is divided into the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and the unorganized militia. The unorganized militia means all other able-bodied males between 18 and 45 who are not members of the National Guard or the Naval Militia.

What does the Army of the United States consist of? Under the law—

The Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Organized Reserves, and the Enlisted Reserve Corps.

The measure with which we are dealing, which is now pending, and upon which we shall have a vote this afternoon, does not deal merely with the National Guard. It deals with all the component parts of the Reserve Army of the United States.

The National Guard happens to consist of 230,000 or 240,000 men, but the Reserve Corps consists of 116,000, I believe. They are not members of the National Guard. They are men who have served in the Army of the United States and have been discharged, and are now members of the Reserve Corps, subject to be called.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. They are really now in the service of the United States. They are in a reserve status.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. They are not National Guard men, of course. They are now in the service of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Texas is correct about that. So that the amendment now pending, offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] not only prohibits the President from sending the National Guard out of continental United States or its possessions, but prevents him from sending any of this reserve army, which has served in the United States Army and is now in the Reserve Corps, outside continental United States or the possessions of the United States, which might include Puerto Rico and the Panama Canal and Hawaii, and under the amendment which I think the Senator accepted, the Philippine Islands.

Mr. President, however much we may be inclined in the Senate to deal in a technical way with the subject of national defense and our program to defend the interests of the United States, I do not believe the American people are looking on this problem in any technical sense. They want the interests of the United States defended. They want to have defended not only continental United States, not only the territory between Canada and the Gulf of Mexico, not only the territory between the two oceans, but they want every vital interest of the United States of America defended wherever that interest may lie. I do not think they interpret that attitude to mean that we have to wait until an aggressor gets on our front porch. It might be all right for us not to defend ourselves until somebody comes into continental United States or into the Panama Canal Zone or lands an army in Hawaii or Puerto Rico, but I do not believe that is the construction the American people have of our duty as a nation.

I might be in my home in a certain square and say that so long as there is a thief or a robber or a murderer in my neighbor's house I owe no duty to help protect my community against such an aggressor. I may conclude that it is proper for me to wait until he enters my yard and gets on my front porch, and then I might go into the living room and lock the front door, hoping that he would not get in, and do nothing further so long as he would stay on the front porch. Of course, I might even go back to the kitchen before I would be willing to defend my home. But the American people, whenever they have been in a conflict with any nation, have never been willing to sit around and wait until the enemy lands in their country. They not only have been willing but they have demanded that our Army and our Navy search out an enemy wherever he might be found anywhere in the world.

According to that theory, Admiral Dewey attacked the Spanish Navy at Manila. The consequences of that great battle may have been in some respects unfortunate, depending entirely upon the viewpoint of individuals with respect to the propriety and wisdom of our taking over the Philippine Islands. That is an academic question now and may be settled in a few years by the independence of the islands, but according to the theory which is advocated by some of our colleagues and friends, Admiral Dewey should have kept the fleet in the harbor of San Francisco, or New York, or New Orleans, and if the Spanish Fleet came by the Golden Gate, then it would have been all right to shoot after we could see the whites of the enemy's eyes.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has referred with illumination to the use of our Army in Russia and in Mexico, and the naval forces at Vera Cruz. I do not see how the adoption of the pending amendment can be held as consistent with the duty of our Government to protect the interests of the United States, by which I mean, to protect the interests of the Western Hemisphere. The original Monroe Doctrine was not promulgated on any theory except that of any European nation obtaining a foothold in the Western Hemisphere which would endanger the safety of the United States, not necessarily by an invading army, but by an invading theory of government. It was to keep out not only armies and conquerors and enemies, but political theories of government, that Monroe declared the Monroe Doctrine. Of course, at that time it applied particularly to European nations, because the South American dependencies of European nations had either declared their independence or were in process of obtaining their independence. But the Monroe Doctrine would be just as applicable if any Asiatic nation were seeking to obtain a foothold in the Western Hemisphere. A few years ago there was a great furor in this country, because it was thought that Japan was about to land or send immigrants or a contingent of her population over to southern California and establish a base in Mexico in order that she might take off from that base and in some way attack California or the western coast of the United States.

Every man who has enlisted in the National Guard in any State since 1916, enlisted with the knowledge that that organization was a part of the Army of the United States, so declared by law, and when he enlisted he took upon himself all the obligations that might be incumbent upon such enlistment.

I think we underestimate the National Guard of this country; I think we underestimate their fiber and their spirit if we assume that they are not willing to go wherever any other soldier of the United States may be called on to go in order to defend the interests of the country. I certainly have heard from no National Guard man who desired to shirk any responsibility that may be incumbent upon him as such.

We in the Senate on the 17th of June, by unanimous vote, declared it to be the policy of this Government that we would not permit the transfer of any territory in the Western Hemisphere now owned by one European nation, to another European nation or other foreign nation. I do not wish to restrict it by using the word "European." I think the joint resolution which we adopted declared our opposition to the transfer of any territory in the Western Hemisphere now owned by a non-American government to another non-American government, no matter where it might be. That joint resolution was adopted by unanimous vote of the United States Senate. Seventy-six members of this body voted for it, and not a single Senator voted against it.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. GILLETTE. The Senator a moment ago made the statement that every man who enlisted in the National Guard by present law became automatically a member of the Army of the United States. The Senator does not mean that, does he?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, yes; under the definition of the United States Army, of course, subject to being called into service. I mean that he enlisted knowing that he was entering an organization that might be called into the service of the Government of the United States.

Mr. GILLETTE. Under certain conditions.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, under certain conditions, yes. I did not mean to mislead the Senate, but what I meant was that every man who joined the National Guard knew at the time he joined that he was subject to call into the service of the United States, and would become an integral part of the United States Army.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HILL. The resolution referred to by the Senator from Kentucky went even further than the Senator suggested, in that it disapproved any transfer of any possession from any present owner to a non-American owner, which, of course, means a transfer from any American owner or any non-American owner to any non-American owner.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct. In other words, the resolution was intended to serve notice on the world that we propose to integrate the territory of the Western Hemisphere as sacred to the Americas, and that we propose to insulate it against any transfer of territory in the Western Hemisphere to any foreign country which does not now own it.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator used the phrase that the resolution provided that the United States would not permit such transfer. Is the Senator accurate in his use of terms?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not quoting from the resolution.

Mr. ADAMS. It seems to me we said we would not recognize such a transfer. That is quite a different thing from not permitting it.

Mr. BARKLEY. How are we to recognize or fail to recognize such a transfer? Was the resolution unanimously adopted merely to be regarded as though it had been passed by a sewing circle, or by a Rotary Club, or by a chamber of commerce, or was it a solemn declaration of the Congress of the United States?

Mr. ADAMS. It was a solemn declaration, but not a declaration that the United States would make war in any instance in which the policy was not complied with, any more than was the original Monroe Doctrine, in substance, a declaration of war.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; of course, it was not a declaration of war, any more than was the original Monroe Doctrine; but I recall no instance since Monroe uttered that doctrine in which the United States would not have been willing to go to war in order to prevent its violation. I recall particularly that when I was a boy Great Britain was undertaking to bring pressure upon Venezuela for the collection of a debt.

Mr. ADAMS. Was it as far back as that? [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; as far back as that. I am sure the Senator cannot remember it, but I do. [Laughter.] Grover Cleveland went out of office in 1897, and I was born several months before that transaction occurred. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. What a wonderful memory [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. I recall Grover Cleveland's message, and his warning to Great Britain that any effort to use the power of Great Britain even to collect a debt against Venezuela would be regarded as a violation of the Monroe Doctrine, and that the United States Government would resist it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Venezuelan dispute was not with regard to collecting a debt. It was a dispute with regard to the boundary between British Guiana and Venezuela.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly President Cleveland, or Secretary Olney, who wrote the message—said in it some things which none of us would be willing to reiterate at this time. In that message he said flatly that the United States is sovereign in the Western Hemisphere, which is contrary to the good-neighbor policy now being pursued by the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. A boundary dispute was involved; but, as I recall, there was also the matter of an indebtedness. My recollection may be faulty, but the point is the same.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] has called attention to the language of the joint resolution which has been passed by Congress. The joint resolution says that the United States will not recognize any such transfer and will not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer any geographic region in the Western Hemisphere. If we are not to acquiesce in any such transfer, how are we to refuse to acquiesce? We certainly cannot refuse to acquiesce merely by remaining at home, sitting on our front porch, and doing nothing to repel the efforts of any foreign nation to take possession of American territory which comes under the purview of the joint resolution. I do not believe Congress meant for our own country or for the world to interpret the joint resolution which we adopted in any such fashion. Certainly I do not believe—and there is nothing in the debates which sustains any such contention—that when we unanimously adopted the joint resolution we had anything else in mind except active resistance to any program which might violate the spirit of the joint resolution.

We do not know what may happen in the world. I very seriously doubt if mankind has ever before faced a situation such as the one which confronts it today. We have read about the Napoleonic wars and about the well-nigh successful effort of Napoleon to obtain control of Europe; but I do not believe that even the control of Europe by Napoleon carried with it the menace to civilization and to America which the present situation in Europe carries to our theory of government and to our safety and the safety of our institutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I did not intend to take time on the joint resolution in connection with this amendment, but I shall take a few minutes, even though I thereby deny myself the right to speak further on the joint resolution from now until the time of the vote.

Mr. President, no one can predict the future for as much as a week ahead. We all have our sympathies, and we have our antipathies. We are all hoping and praying that the process and theory of democracy may not be driven from the earth; but it may be that democracy's last stand will be made in the Western Hemisphere.

Are we willing by our action here to say to the American people and to the world—and I think we must keep in mind the effect of our action here upon others throughout the world—that although we believe in democracy and in our theory of government and that any encroachment upon our neighbors who believe in the same theory is in effect an encroachment upon us, we are not willing to send our Army out of the United States, or out of Puerto Rico, or the Canal Zone, or Hawaii, or the Philippines, in order to justify our faith in the democratic theory? It is proposed not only that we shall not send the National Guard but that we shall not send the Reserve force, which has already served in the United States Army, not as a part of the National Guard but as a part of the Regular Army. We are not willing to send them across the Canadian border, where for 150 years not even a rifle has been mounted to protect us against our neighbor or our neighbor against us. We are not willing to send our armed forces across the line to protect ourselves by protecting our neighbor. We are not willing to send them to Mexico.

In Habana a week or two ago Secretary of State Hull accomplished a stupendous victory in bringing about a further consolidation of the 21 republics of the Western Hemisphere, at which conference the American nations were organized into an agreement to cooperate not only in carrying out the joint resolution which we adopted by unanimous vote but in assuming a joint responsibility in the administration of such territories as may come within that category and a joint responsibility in the preservation of the Western Hemisphere. It is proposed that in pursuance of that agreement we shall not send any of the men involved in this legislation into any of those countries, either with or without their consent, without an act of Congress repealing the law as it will stand if the amendment now pending shall be agreed to.

Mr. President, in view of all these things, in view of the obligations we have willingly assumed, and which the American people are willing to carry out without regard to any sacrifice they may be called upon to make, it seems to me it would be extremely unwise to adopt this amendment on our own account; and it seems to me it would be folly by its adoption to serve notice on the rest of the world that all our pious resolutions in behalf of liberty, democracy, and American solidarity are of no more effect than if they had been adopted by a quilting league.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I think the Senator ought to qualify that statement somewhat. The only purpose of the amendment is to retain that power in the Congress, and let the Congress carry out its resolutions, rather than turn the matter over to the uncontrolled discretion of the Executive. The amendment which is now pending would not prevent the United States from performing in a constitutional way whatever obligations it may have.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let us take the Senator's observation at its face value, which I do. I take all his statements at their face value, because the Senator knows that for no other Member of this body have I greater respect and affection than I have for the Senator from Colorado. I know that it is sometimes hard for me to follow him, and frequently impossible, but I always respect his sincerity and I think that situation is mutual, by the way.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. I always respect his sincerity and his ability, and I always try to look into any suggestion he makes with meticulous care lest I might be wrong in my opposition to it. But let us suppose that Congress were not in session—and I realize that under modern transportation the President can get us here in a few days—and that an enemy army should land in Mexico or in Canada or in Bermuda or Martinique or in some other territory close by the United States, and it was necessary for us to oppose that invasion "pronto," as they say in the West, would the Senator think we ought to wait for the President to call Congress back in session?

Mr. ADAMS. It is merely a question whether the Senator believes in the fundamentals of the American Constitution. The Constitution may be wrong, but the Constitution places the determination of that question in the Congress.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes; Congress has power to declare war, but if some other nation makes war upon us, the President of the United States is not necessarily required to wait until Congress adopts a formal declaration of war before he can defend the institutions and the territory of the United States.

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true; the Senator agrees to it.

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the Senator that at the proper place I should be quite willing to insert the words "they shall not be employed in time of peace." That is, I think, the distinction which should be drawn, and I have in mind, if the amendment should be adopted, to add those words.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think that would help it any.

Mr. ADAMS. I know the Senator does not.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am frank about that, but I do not think it would; we might as well say that the Army shall not be employed in time of peril.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I merely wish to ask the Senator does he mean to say that any nation in the world could land an army in Mexico overnight and we would not know anything about it?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I am not saying that.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Before an army started from Europe we would know of it 3 months in advance.

Mr. BARKLEY. What would we do about it under the authority of this amendment?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Congress could be called in session.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the authority of this amendment, if we could not send our Army to repel such an invasion, we ought not to send our Navy.

Mr. REYNOLDS. We can give the President authority to dispatch men there.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to give the National Guard and other components of the Army when covered into the Army absolute liberty under the direction of the President. I find, however, that I cannot do that unless I have some assurance that there will be exemptions in the case of the present National Guard. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] yesterday offered an amendment providing that within 20 days any member of the guard might resign. I voted for that amendment. It was defeated by a few votes. I think that amendment should apply solely to men who have dependents, a wife or a child or children, and who must rely solely upon their wages or salary to support their dependents. There is no doubt, as the Senator from Texas said, it is the intention to weed out those who have dependents. If that is the case, why not let these men have assurance that they will be weeded out? The Governor of my State would probably accept the resignation of a member of the National Guard who had a wife and child or children dependent upon him and who had no means of supporting himself except his wages or his salary. But why not give some assurance to the man in that class who joined the National Guard probably under the theory that it was a home-defense unit, no matter what the law might be?

I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Colorado on the theory that the amendment I propose to offer, which is the same as the one as the Senator from Connecticut offered except it is limited to persons in the class who have dependents upon them, a wife or a child or children, and who have to rely upon their wages and salaries to support their dependents, will sufficiently safeguard the situation. If that amendment subsequently shall not be adopted, I shall move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Colorado was rejected, if it shall be rejected.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into a discussion of the Danaher amendment, which was debated at considerable length yesterday, except to say that I do not believe we can justify putting the National Guard on a different basis from everybody else in the United States who is subject to call to the military service. Assuming that we pass the military-training bill, every man who is called up will not himself be authorized to determine whether he is exempted or excused, but the Government of the United States will have some voice in determining that question. Based upon the fact that any officer or enlisted man in the National Guard can now tender his resignation and claim that his circumstances justify his dismissal, just so any draftee may under the military-training bill, after such draftee shall be drawn into the service, make similar application to the President of the United States. My objection to the Danaher amendment and to any similar amendment is that it leaves it entirely to the soldier himself to decide whether he shall be relieved of service.

Mr. PITTMAN. Is that true?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; it is true under the language of the amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Is it true with the qualification that the soldier himself must have a dependent wife or dependent child or children, and that he has no means of support except his wage or salary?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a fact that ought to be taken into consideration, but under the Danaher amendment it is simply provided that he may resign.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that, but the War Department will determine for the President as to whether those facts exist, and if they do not exist the Department will not grant the request.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if another amendment along that line is offered, we can discuss it at the time. I do not desire to take any more time of the Senate, but I hope the amendment now pending, offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], will be rejected.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the pending Adams amendment, except to observe that I shall cast my vote against it.

Under the unanimous-consent rule which was adopted earlier today, providing that a vote shall be had upon the joint resolution and all amendments and motions thereto at 4 o'clock this afternoon, I apprehend that I shall not have an opportunity to explain an amendment which I propose to offer to the pending joint resolution. So I shall take advantage of this opportunity to make a brief explanation of it.

On August 1, I sent to the desk to be printed in the RECORD an amendment to the pending joint resolution. The amendment applies the benefits of the Soldiers and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, approved March 18, 1918, "to all National Guard, Reserve, and retired personnel ordered into the active military service under the authority of this joint resolution," and so long as they shall continue "in such service and for 60 days thereafter."

There are certain provisions of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act, which, in my humble judgment, are not applicable to the present situation, and, therefore, under the terms of the amendment they are excluded.

Mr. President, the situation which will confront the National Guard and other personnel of the Reserves who will be drafted into service under the joint resolution is practically the same as that which confronted the men who were drafted into the military service in the World War. They will be men who will be called from their usual vocations; they will be drafted into the military service; they will not be able properly to defend themselves in civil actions which may be instituted against them. They will be men who have incurred obligations which under the incomes they derive from their vocations or from their present employment they could readily and promptly meet, but which, under the stipend which will be paid them as component parts of the United States Army, they will be unable to meet. So the Congress of the United States in 1918, when it had enacted the selective draft, provided for the relief of men thus mustered into the service. That act, which by this amendment I seek to make a part of the pending joint resolution, leaves a large discretion in all the courts of the United States, both Federal and State, courts of record and courts that are not of record, to grant relief to defendants who are in the military service in suits that are instituted against them.

The court has authority to abate proceedings. The act requires that no judgment by default shall be rendered against one in the military service unless an attorney has been appointed to represent him; and that, if a judgment is rendered against him, then the court may require the plaintiff to furnish bond in such amount as will indemnify the soldier when he returns home in the event that he suffers any loss by reason of the rendition of the judgment. It also authorizes the court rendering judgment to vacate the judgment when the soldier makes a showing to the court that he had a meritorious defense of which he had been deprived.

Specifically, in reference to rental contracts, the act provides that no one in the military service may be evicted under a rental contract when the rent is under $50 a month, and that the court, on application of the person in the military service or anyone in his behalf, may grant a stay of proceedings for a certain time.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. OVERTON. I do.

Mr. BONE. I think most of us are familiar with the provisions that were adopted during the World War for the protection of men in the service. I should like to ask the Senator if the suggestion he now intends to make in the form of an amendment is substantially that which was in existence during the World War.

Mr. OVERTON. It is substantially the same, with two exceptions. I have not included within my amendment the provision in reference to taxes and the provision in reference to insurance, because I do not think they are altogether applicable to the present situation.

Mr. BONE. I do not recall what provision for taxes existed during the World War. Perhaps some other Member of the Senate will recall. I do not know whether we would have a right to forbid a State, or a political subdivision of a State, from assessing and collecting taxes. It might be that the authority of Congress would extend that far. I do recall, however, that we abated suits very completely; and as this measure has been under discussion I have wondered what we were going to do to protect the men who are called into the service. Obviously, many of them have commitments of some sort, and their families are going to lose their income, and some protection will have to be given them along the lines indicated by the Senator from Louisiana, or else they will be in serious trouble. Many of them have no idea how long they will be in the field.

Mr. OVERTON. I thank the Senator for his contribution. Take the case of furniture, automobiles, or other articles bought on installment. If one who is drafted is an employee in some industry or under other private employment making $150, $200, or $250 a month, he can very well meet the obligation he has incurred; but when the strong arm of the Government reaches out and drafts him into the military service and pays him $21 a month he then becomes financially unable, by our own act, to meet such an obligation, and he is entitled to relief.

This act also, as the Senator doubtless knows, provides that when one who is in the military service is otherwise financially able to meet his obligations, he can be required to respond to them, and judgment may be rendered against him; but in other cases involving purchases on installments, both of real estate as a home, or otherwise, and the acquisition of personal property, the court has authority to do several things. For instance, it may require the creditor to return all installments that have been previously paid, or it may continue the proceedings, or it may take such other action as the court deems proper and necessary in order to protect the rights of the absentee soldier in the service of his country.

I do not think there will be any objection on the part of any Member of the Senate to this amendment. I called the attention of the able Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], who is in charge of this joint resolution, to the amendment I have proposed to offer, and I understood him to say he would have no objection to the amendment; on the contrary, he thought some action of that kind should be taken.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I understand that similar action was taken during the World War.

Mr. OVERTON. Similar action was taken during the World War.

Mr. SHEPPARD. So far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection.

Mr. OVERTON. In conclusion, I desire to say that I do not contend that this is a perfect amendment. I think the legislation of 1918 could probably be perfected so as more adequately or more properly to meet the present situation.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. I will yield in a moment. I took up the matter with the War Department, and it stated that it had in contemplation drafting a separate bill which it thought would meet the problem. I do not understand that the War Department has any objection at all to this amendment, or that any other Department of the Government has; but the bill which the War Department is contemplating will take some time to prepare, and in the meantime I think this amendment ought to be adopted. When that bill is introduced it may be used as a substitute for this amendment.

I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I merely wish to interrupt the Senator to say that it will be necessary for me to leave the chamber, and I shall not be present to vote on this amendment, or perhaps on any of the amendments pending to the joint resolution; but I very much hope this amendment will be adopted, and desire to record myself as affirmatively favoring it. I think the Senator is wise in inserting the amendment in this particular joint resolution, notwithstanding the fact that there may be some subsequent general legislation that will cover it.

Mr. OVERTON. I thank the Senator from Georgia for his cooperation and his statement in support of the amendment.

In conclusion, I desire to say that if the legislation now being prepared by the War Department is not ready when the compulsory military training bill is brought up, I propose to offer to that bill an amendment similar to the one I am now proposing to this measure.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, during the course of this discussion some doubt has been raised as to just what is meant by the expression "Western Hemisphere." I should like to advise about that matter with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, and ask him to correct me if I am in error when I give my understanding of what is meant by that phrase.

As I understand the phrase, it does not include Europe or Africa. It does not include New Zealand or Siberia. It does include all of the American continents, and the waters and islands thereto appertaining.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LODGE. The question of whether or not Iceland is a part of the Western Hemisphere is not decided one way or the other.

Mr. President, as I have repeatedly stated on the floor of the Senate, it is my judgment that the area which we should defend, and which we must defend, and the defense of which is essential to the existence of this Nation, is what I have called the base area embracing North America, Central America, the coasts and islands of the Caribbean, the Panama Canal Zone, and the area necessary to the defense of the Canal. In other words, I do not think the extreme southern end of South America is essential to the defense of the United States, and if I were to prescribe the formula I would not include it; nor do I think we are capable of defending the Philippine Islands. I very much doubt whether, even under the most happy and peaceful conditions in Europe, we could defend the Philippine Islands against an oriental aggressor. It would take several years merely to construct the shipping which would be necessary to maintain a fleet at the end of such a long line of communication.

I recognize that we are obligated to defend the Philippines until they shall have acquired their independence, and that that, of course, is the reason why that language is included in the joint resolution; but I want the RECORD to show my lack of faith in our ability to do that, together with my conviction that a foreign policy which is not accurately geared to a nation's military policy is a snare and a delusion. One of the things which did France so much harm was that their military policy contemplated simply the defense of their own country, whereas their foreign policy undertook to underwrite Czechoslovakia and Poland and a number of other countries; and, in my opinion, when the day comes when we are no longer responsible for the defense of the Philippines, it will be a very happy day for the United States.

I merely make these observations because I am, on the whole, favorably impressed with the language which the committee put into the joint resolution. To my mind what we should have in this measure, as in the next one to come before us, is a flat declaration that we will not send any troops to Europe. In my opinion, that is the most important thing of all. If the language which is in the joint resolution does not suit every Member of the Senate down to the last detail, that is only natural, and I can perfectly well understand the reluctance of the Senator from Texas to make any changes in language which has been agreed to by the committee. I think it is a splendid thing to have language in the joint resolution which will specifically prohibit, as I understand the language definitely does, the sending of any soldiers to Europe, because in my opinion that is one of the greatest dangers we face.

Mr. President, for the purpose of the RECORD, I wish to take up a matter which is not related to the pending measure, but which is of some interest to Massachusetts, and which has a very real relationship to national defense. I refer to the proposal to abandon the Old Colony Railroad, which serves a group of industrial communities south of Boston, and which, it may properly be said, is the lifeblood of many of those communities and on which 10,000 people depend as commuters alone.

It is interesting to point out that the abandonment of this railroad undoubtedly will have an adverse effect on the national-defense program. The Fore River Shipbuilding Co., at Quincy, Mass., which at present is engaged in the construction of a great many warships of various types, employs 7,900 people and has a pay roll averaging a million dollars a month. I am advised that the superintendent of this plant testified that if this rail service were discontinued their operations would be so adversely affected within 30 days as to make continuance uneconomical, and perhaps, as a practical matter, impossible.

At this point it may be well also to mention the fact that Capt. Louis P. Davis, Inspector of Ordnance, in charge of the Naval Ammunition Depot at Hingham, Mass., also took part in the hearing, representing the commandant of the First Naval District. He testified that the proposed abandonment would seriously affect the efficiency of the Naval Ammunition Depot at Hingham, and thereby adversely affect national defense. He referred to the Hingham Depot as the only naval ammunition depot on the New England coast, and emphasized that rail connections were necessary to permit the proper handling of gunpowder, shells, cartridge cases, cartridge tanks, fuzes, and other supplies.

I may say that the present status of the abandonment proceedings is that the hearings have been closed and briefs filed, and parties in interest are now awaiting the examiner's report.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, during the debate on the pending amendment my mind has constantly gone back to the months of last year, to January 1939, and the winter and spring of that year, when the Chief Executive of this Nation and the State Department of our Government were both doing everything they could to get the Senate and the Congress to pass a joint resolution providing for the repeal of the arms embargo. We recall how through those months the Chief Executive and the State Department urged upon the Senate and the Congress the enactment of the joint resolution for the repeal of the arms embargo. We recall how the State Department advised members of this body that in its opinion if the Congress would pass the joint resolution providing for the repeal of the arms embargo such action by the Congress might even prevent the outbreak of war in Europe.

We recall how, in spite of the pleas and the entreaties on the part of the Chief Executive and the State Department, on July 11 last year the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, by a vote of 12 to 11, refused to report favorably to the Senate the joint resolution for the repeal of the arms embargo.

We recall how in September war broke out in Europe, and Congress was called into special session, and in October we passed the joint resolution providing for the repeal of the arms embargo. But we did not pass that joint resolution until after the war had broken out in Europe and it was too late to help avert the tragedy.

As we consider the war in Europe, all of the misery, all of the heartaches, all of the sorrow and the suffering, all of the devastation and destruction, all of the tragedy it has wrought, some of us cannot but feel that the Senate and the Congress made a grievious mistake when they turned a deaf ear to the pleas of the Chief Executive and the Secretary of State and refused to pass the joint resolution before the outbreak of the war.

I am fearful that if the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] shall be adopted and shall become a part of the pending measure, the hour may come when Members of the Senate will have cause to feel that the adoption of the amendment was a fearful mistake. In fact, I believe that it is entirely possible that the adoption of the amendment might bring results more far reaching, might bring results which would more adversely and far more dangerously affect our country than did even the outbreak of the war in Europe. So I rise, Mr. President, to utter my protest against the adoption of the amendment.

As has been stated by different Senators in the debate, on the 17th day of June last the Senate passed Senate Joint Resolution 271, in which the Senate, speaking for the American people, declared to the world that the Senate recognized that many unexpected developments were arising daily from the present grave international situation, and that such developments were affecting States in the Western Hemisphere, and might even endanger the peace and security of our country. The resolution further declared that the United States would never recognize or acquiesce in any violation of the Monroe Doctrine.

Armed with this resolution, armed with this expression of the Senate of the United States, our Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, went to the Habana Conference, and there he won what has been acclaimed generally throughout the Nation as a great triumph. There he accomplished one of the most outstanding and signal accomplishments ever achieved by any American statesman in all the history of our country, because in that conference Cordell Hull, as our Secretary of State, got the other republics of this hemisphere to agree not only to accept and recognize the Monroe Doctrine, but to assume their responsibility and play their part in the enforcement and defense of the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am impressed with the very interesting and able address of the Senator, and I presume he may intend to speak of what seems to me appropriate at this time; that is, that the House of Representatives also passed House Joint Resolution 556, which restated the Monroe Doctrine in a similar way to that adopted by the Senate. So that really both Houses of the Congress of the United States have announced a sort of restatement of the Monroe Doctrine, although they have not concurred.

Mr. HILL. I thank the Senator for his contribution. The RECORD shows that both Houses of Congress spoke on the subject, that both Houses reaffirmed their belief in and their allegiance to the Monroe Doctrine, proclaimed to the world that we would not recognize or acquiesce in any action contrary to the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. Hull, our Secretary of State, returned a few days ago from his great work at Habana, and on Monday, before leaving the city for a few days to take a much needed and greatly deserved rest, he issued a statement. Although the statement was issued to the country, I cannot but feel that when Mr. Hull issued the statement he had directly in mind the Senate and the Congress of the United States, and the question which confronts the Senate this day.

Mr. Hull stated:

> The vast forces of lawlessness, conquest, and destruction are still moving across the earth like a savage and dangerous animal at large. By their very nature, those forces will not stop unless and until they recognize that there exists unbreakable resistance.

At Habana—

Says Mr. Hull—

> we forged new instrumentalities of continental defense. These will be of vast importance to our Nation and to every American nation. But there are other and immense tasks still before us.

Then Mr. Hull goes on to say:

> I would greatly prefer to say that we are safe in this country and in this hemisphere from outside danger. But I am firmly convinced that what is taking place today in many areas of the earth is a relentless attempt to transform the civilized world as we have known it into a world in which lawlessness, violence, and force will reign supreme, as they did a thousand years ago. The people of this country cannot recognize too soon this fact and its overwhelming significance for our national safety and for the maintenance of our national institutions.
> The one and only sure way for our Nation to avoid being drawn into serious trouble or actual war by the wild and destructive forces now abroad elsewhere in the world and to command respect for its rights and interests abroad is for our people to become thoroughly conscious of the possibilities of danger, to make up their minds that we must continue to arm, and to arm to such an extent that the forces of conquest and ruin will not dare make an attack on us or on any part of this hemisphere. * * * In the face of terrific problems and conditions—> and until the present serious threats and dangers have disappeared, we cannot pursue complacently the course of our customary normal life.

I feel constrained—

> thus to offer my views in the light of what is already a dangerously widespread movement for world conquest and for the destruction of most of the worth-while things which civilization has given the human race.

Mr. President, we must recognize Mr. Hull, as Secretary of State, has sources of information which are not available to us which, by their very nature, cannot be made public. He has his official reports from the representatives of the State Department in every country and in every quarter of the globe. These representatives—trained, educated, experienced men—are constantly sending their reports on conditions in the countries in which they now reside, and on world conditions as they learn those conditions. Secretary Hull has at his command all the while, due to these reports, a present-day picture of the situation in each country of the world. He says to us that the danger is so great, that the peril is so great—

> That we must continue to arm, and to arm to such an extent that the forces of conquest and ruin will not dare make an attack on us or on any part of this hemisphere.

Yet we sit here today considering the proposition that we will call out the great Reserve forces of the Army of the United States, and then say to those Reserve forces, "You shall go so far, and no further, in the defense of our country. We will limit you, we will circumscribe you, and we will hamstring you when we call you out, and we will say that only within certain limitations can you function, only within certain limitations can you defend the country."

Not only do we hamstring and seriously hamper the effectiveness of the Reserves that we propose to call out, but we also hamstring and hamper the effectiveness of our Regular Army, because when these Reserves are called out they will be brought into the same organizations with our Regular troops. There will no longer be a Reserve component, a National Guard component, and a Regular Army component. Efficiency and effectiveness demand that they must all be brought together in one great organization, one great army of the United States.

Let me say that whatever we may think of the Germans, however much we may hate everything that Nazi Germany stands for today, the world has been forced to stand in admiration, not because of the many tanks or airplanes that Germany has produced, not because of the large numbers of men she has called to the colors, but because of the marvelous coordination and the marvelous efficiency of her Army. Above all else, the victories that the German Army has won have been due to this marvelous coordination, and efficiency of that Army moving forward as one united, powerful, striking machine. Yet we are going to constitute the Army of the United States, and it is proposed that we say to some of the units, "You can go thus far," and to other units, "You cannot go that far. You can only go part of the way."

The Reserve officers, the Reserves of the enlisted personnel of the Army, are Reserves of the Regular Army, and when they come in they will come in to serve with that Army and as a part of that Army.

Yesterday, I called attention to the fact that the strip of land which we own in Panama is only about 10 miles wide. If anything should occur on either side of that 10-mile strip which in any way threatens our country or its interests, the President of the United States as the Commander in Chief of the Army, could send any part of the Regular Army, or the whole Regular Army, across that 10-mile strip to meet the threat. But if there are Reserve officers with that Regular Army, if there are any Reserve components with that Regular Army, and if we shall adopt the amendment which is now pending, then, before any soldier can move out to meet the threat, to stop the danger, we must first stop and reorganize our Army so as to be sure to cull out and leave at home those who might be in that Army who have come from the Reserve components.

So, Mr. President, if we must adopt this amendment, if the joint resolution cannot be passed except by writing this amendment into it, I seriously doubt whether or not we will do very much for the national defense by calling out these Reserve components.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HILL. Then I shall take 20 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has taken his time on the bill.

Mr. HILL. No; I have taken 20 minutes on the amendment, I will say to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senator's time has expired in both respects.

Mr. HILL. Surely the Senator has not been speaking for 40 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say that he is now informed that the Senator has 20 minutes left on the bill.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Alabama would like to submit an inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HILL. The Senator understood that he had 20 minutes on the amendment and that he had 20 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct, but the Chair had been informed that the Senator had already used 20 minutes.

Mr. HILL. The Senator used 20 minutes yesterday, but he used those 20 minutes discussing the Danaher amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he is in error. The Senator has 20 minutes on the bill. The Senator from Alabama may proceed.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Alabama thanks the Chair.

Mr. President, I am thinking of what will be the effect on our neighbors in Central and South America, and on the dictator nations in Europe, if the pending amendment is written into the joint resolution. When I think of our neighbors in South America, my mind turns to an article which appeared in the Washington Daily News of August 5 last, captioned "South America doubts United States power in crisis."

I do not have time to read the excerpts from that article which I should like to read. The article is written by Mr. William Philip Simms, one of the most intelligent, one of the most observant, and, I dare say, one of the most patriotic correspondents we have in America, a man who has won an international reputation by the articles he has sent back to us from Europe on the European war. Mr. Simms captions the article with these words:

South America doubts United States power in crisis.

The opening sentences of the article are:

American history hangs in the balance. The way the balance will swing depends upon whether Hitler crushes England or comes to grief against the white cliffs of Dover.

Mr. Simms then goes on to tell of a very recent trip of some 15,000 miles which took him south of the Caribbean Sea, almost to Cape Horn. In the article he tells of dangers and dangerous conditions which he himself found in South America. Then he closes with a significant conversation which took place between him and an Argentinian. This Argentinian had said:

If Germany wins, she will dominate Europe. There will be no balance of power and probably no British Fleet to stand between us—and whatever unscrupulous nations might wish to expand in our direction. With nothing to fear from a down-and-out England and France—or from Russia, whose chief desire of the moment is to see the United States and Japan in a war so she can gobble up the pieces—what's to keep Hitler from crossing the Atlantic?

Mr. Simms' answer was that Uncle Sam's Navy might keep him from crossing. Then the Argentinian said:

And leave Hawaii, the Philippines, your rubber and tin routes to the East Indies, and the Pacific approaches to Panama Canal unguarded? Have you any guaranty that Japan won't strike the moment you mix with Germany in the Atlantic?

The dictators have a way of striking without warning. That is one of the lessons of the past year.

The "blitzkrieg," the hurricane of death, the storm of destruction overnight without warning, which comes from the dictator nations.

Mr. Simms closes his article with these significant words:

It may surprise you—

That is, it may surprise us in the United States—and hurt your pride to hear this, but South Americans seem to doubt our ability to cope with the totalitarian world now aborning. * * * They are waiting to see which way the cat is going to jump.

Of course, the South Americans were told before the Habana Conference—and they are no doubt being told by their "fifth columnists" and by the representatives of foreign governments in South America today—that the whole purpose and object of the United States in its efforts at the Habana Conference was to have the South American republics committed to fight for the protection and security of the United States. If we adopt the pending amendment, they will be taunted with the statement that the Congress of the United States suggested the Habana compact, proclaiming allegiance to the Monroe Doctrine, and then proceeded to write into the law a limitation prohibiting the great reserve components of the Army of the United States from protecting or defending the Monroe Doctrine.

What would be the effect of such a situation on the South American people? We declare that we are for the Monroe Doctrine, and after we persuade the other nations to join us in that declaration and in a mutual covenant to defend and support it we say that we will not allow a large part of our Army and trained forces to be used to defend that doctrine.

What would be the effect of the pending amendment so far as the dictator nations of Europe are concerned? We can imagine the smirking smile which will come to the faces of some of the dictators when they read—which I hope to heaven they will never do—that this amendment has been put in the joint resolution. What will they say? "It is the same old story of the democracies. They have not the will or the purpose to defend themselves. The Congress of the United States is doing the same thing that all the parliamentary bodies of the democracies of Europe did before they went to their deaths and their people went to slavery at our hands. They are dawdling. They are delaying. They are bungling. They have not the courage, the will, or the purpose to recognize the threat and to meet it, and to go forward in a way as to build their arms and to insure their defense."

The failure of the democracies of Europe lay in the fact that the people and the representatives of those people in their parliamentary bodies failed to recognize the magnitude of the task which lay before them. Those people were too short of vision to combine their strength while they were free people, that they might continue to be free.

This is the challenge, Mr. President, which the pending amendment presents to the Senate today. Shall we go forward with high resolution and determination and build our defenses as we should if we are to meet the threat? We cannot prepare half-heartedly. We cannot prepare delicately. The only way we can prepare is with all our heart, all our mind, and all our soul. Surely the best, if not the only, guaranty we have of peace for our country is to build our arms so strong that, as Secretary Hull suggests, no nation will dare to attack us.

I said in the beginning that I feared that if this amendment were adopted the hour would come when we should rue its adoption as much and possibly far more than we rue the fact that the Senate did not pass the resolution for the repeal of the arms embargo when the President and the Secretary of State were begging us and urging us to pass it. I can think of nothing at this time which might be more inviting of distress and danger for our country than the adoption of this amendment. I hope it will be voted down and that by its rejection the Senate will again serve notice on all the world that we propose to defend the Monroe Doctrine, and that we intend to go forward as speedily and effectively as possible in preparing to defend that doctrine.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I sat in my seat and listened with much pleasure and profit to the able presentation made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. I am in accord with almost every word he said; but I am not in accord with some of his conclusions.

Having stated my attitude toward this proposed legislation day before yesterday, at this time I should not intrude and impose my voice on the Senate were it not for the fact that statements have been made in the debate which I feel should not be left unchallenged, and which, I am sorry to say, in my humble opinion, show some misconception as to the proposal before us in its purpose and import.

I do not presume, nor have I the temerity, to attempt to argue with the able constitutional lawyers of the Senate the constitutional questions which have presented themselves here; but, Mr. President, while I cannot build a road, while I cannot discuss civil engineering or construction engineering I can see the road when it is built, and I think I can see the road on which this proposed legislation is taking us. So I do not want this debate to close without the RECORD showing the problems and the questions that are before us to be determined by the vote of the Senate at 4 o'clock this afternoon, so far as the action of this body is concerned.

I desire to start where the able junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] started yesterday. I will not stop, however, where he stopped. I desire to start with the Constitution of the United States and the powers that it confers upon the Congress with reference to the national defense. I will do so as briefly as possible. I am aware that I shall cover ground that has been covered before, but, in order to point to the conclusion which I have reached, I must refer to it again.

The Constitution of the United States clothes the Congress with the power to provide for the common defense, to declare war, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. It also clothes Congress with the power—

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

The junior Senator from Texas turned to the provision of the Constitution which clothes the President with the power of being Commander in Chief.

The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States—and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States.

Does it stop there? No—

He becomes Commander in Chief of the militia when they are called into the actual service of the United States.

The able majority leader this morning, in his prefatory remarks called attention to a provision of law which, under authority conferred by the Constitution, the Congress has enacted.

The Army of the United States—

That is the first thing—

The Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army—

It formerly read this way:

The Regular Army, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, the Officers' Reserve Corps, and the Organized Reserves.

But in 1920 the words "National Guard of the United States" were added. Those components constitute the Army of the United States. For peacetime purposes the Army of the United States is composed of—

The Regular Army, the National Guard, the Organized Reserves * * * necessary to form the basis for a complete and immediate mobilization for the national defense in the event of a national emergency declared by Congress.

The Regular Army of the United States can be called into service by the President of the United States for foreign service. The militia of the United States, which, of course, is divided, as has been said over and over again, into the unorganized militia, composed of men between certain ages and with certain other qualifications, the Organized Militia and the National Guard of the United States. Often they comprise the same component units, but not necessarily so. Congress has drawn the distinction.

The question was raised before the Supreme Court at the time of the draft: Does not the limitation placed in the Constitution, which gives the power to Congress to provide for calling out the militia only in the three specified instances, preclude and prevent the enactment of a conscription law which will call them into the foreign service in time of war? The United States district court in Delaware discussed the matter very fully in the case of United States v. Stephens (245 Fed. Reporter), and this is a brief statement:

Congress under the power given by the Constitution (art. I, sec. 8) to declare war, raise armies, and do all things necessary and proper for execution of that power, can by conscription organize the militia of the United States, as defined by the National Defense Act, June 3, 1916, for foreign warfare, as done by the Selective Draft Act of May 18, 1917; and the power given by such section of the Constitution to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union in the three instances specified in the Constitution relate only to the Organized State Militia as such.

In discussing that question, in its opinion, the Court said:

The power of Congress to raise armies, like the power to declare war, is unconditional, unqualified, and absolute, and Congress is the exclusive judge of the necessity for the exercise of the power and of the means and manner prescribed by it for its exercise. The constitutional provisions relating to the militia manifestly apply to State militia in contradistinction to the militia of the United States.

Let me go back to an earlier statement in the opinion where the Court said:

It is not denied, but conceded, that the Regular Army as constituting part of the permanent Military Establishment of the United States may be compelled to render military service abroad.

The Court said there is no question of that.

The provisions of the Constitution relating to the militia having application only to the Organized State Militia, it does not follow—

Listen to this—

it does not follow, from the lack of power in Congress to send such militia—

That is, the Organized State Militia—to fight in a foreign country, that Congress has not the power to organize the militia of the United States and send it to any part of the globe deemed best for the conduct of military operations.

The Congress in the Defense Act made another provision. They redefined what the militia is, and provided—

That whenever the United States is invaded or in danger of invasion from any foreign nation, or of rebellion—

Repeating the language, of course, of the Constitution—against the authority of the Government of the United States, or the President is unable with the regular forces at his command to execute the laws of the Union, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth such number of the militia of the State or of the States or Territories or of the District of Columbia as he may deem necessary to repel such invasion, suppress such rebellion, or to enable him to execute such laws.

And so forth.

I quote further:

That whenever the President calls forth the Organized Militia of any State, Territory, or of the District of Columbia * * * he may specify in his call the period for which such service is required, and the militia so called shall continue to serve during the term so specified, either within or without the United States.

That is, when the call is made under the constitutional powers amplified and reasserted by the Congress, the President has the power, for the specific purposes mentioned, to order the militia into the service—and the distinction was drawn by the eminent Senator from Vermont earlier in this debate.

The Supreme Court, in a decision in Thirty-third United States, said:

> Whenever the United States is invaded or in danger of invasion by any foreign nation or rebellion against the authority of the United States, and the President is unable, with the regular forces, to execute the laws of the United States, we are all of the opinion—

> we are all of the opinion that the authority to decide whether the exigency as arisen belongs exclusively to the President and that his decision is conclusive on any other person.

With the constitutional provision reasserted in the statute, when those conditions arise and we have, following our constitutional duty, said under what conditions that call can be exercised, and it is left to the discretion of the President, then we cannot question it. He has the right for those purposes to call them in, as the statute says, within or without the jurisdiction of the United States; and he can use the Regular Army, he can use the Marine Corps, he can use the Navy for national defense. But we are dealing in this particular case with another element entirely.

We added to the statute a separate category, the National Guard of the United States; we specified what constituted the National Guard of the United States; and we provided by statutory enactment the conditions under which they may be ordered into the service. This is outside of the call of the militia under the constitutional provision. This is outside of the right of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. It is a statutory provision under which we definitely lay down the conditions under which the National Guard of the United States may be ordered into the service of the United States.

What are those conditions? When shall they be called? When Congress shall have declared a national emergency to exist, and shall have authorized the use of troops over and above the Regular Army. That is when they may be called.

Where shall they be called to serve? They may be ordered into the military service of the United States "to serve therein." How long? For the period of the war or emergency.

In the case of the unorganized militia, which the President under the decision of the Supreme Court may now organize into an army, and in the case of the Organized State Militia which he may call out, he states the time for which they are called. No man may be compelled to serve for longer than the term of his enlistment, excepting that when he is called out under that authority of the Constitution, when the President has called out the State militia, he may extend the time 6 months. Under this provision for ordering out the National Guard of the United States—not calling it out under the constitutional provision, but ordering it out under the statute in which we lay down the conditions under which it may be ordered out, when we say an emergency exists, to serve the United States therein for the period of emergency—what about these men who are enlisted for a year and have another 30 days to run, if this joint resolution is passed? Under the law, even if this joint resolution is passed, could they be ordered to serve for 12 months, in the face of the provision which limits their service definitely to the expiration of their enlistment?

But, leaving that aside, we are asked by some not to take such a position that our action will have an unfortunate psychological effect on South America or Central America or anywhere else in the world, because the power exists under the Constitution and the statutes to order out certain parts of our defense forces and use them as the President sees fit, and under that constitutional authority he is the sole judge as to the use of certain troops, the marines, the Regular Army, the Organized Militia of the States. The point with me, and the one I have tried to present here, is that I want first to preserve, as the Senator from Colorado I am sure wants to preserve and I am sure every Senator wants to preserve in the Congress of the United States, where the Constitution has placed it, and where the present statutes place it, the right to declare an emergency.

As a side light on that subject, may I refer to the history of this legislation? Let me give one excerpt.

The President sent to Congress a message from which I will quote. Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, on July 30, 1940, declared it to be "urgently necessary that at least a portion of the National Guard be ordered to active duty and recruited up to full strength and seasoned and trained as rapidly as possible"; and the Constitution placed that training in the hands of the States under the discipline laid down by the Congress. On July 29, 1940, the President sent up the following communication:

> I am therefore transmitting herewith legislation that, if enacted, will enable me to order the National Guard of the United States to active service for such period of intensive training as may be necessary to raise its efficiency to a point comparable with that of our small Regular Establishment.

On May 31, 1940, the President sent to Congress a message in which he urged—

> That before adjournment this Congress grant me the authority to call into active service such portion of the National Guard as may be deemed necessary to maintain our position of neutrality and to safeguard the national defense.

Following that message, on June 3, Representative MAY, chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs, introduced House Joint Resolution 555. In its original form, it provided:

> That if, at any time prior to the convening of the Seventy-seventh Congress, the present Congress is not in session and, in the opinion of the President, a national emergency arises requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army, the President be, and is hereby, authorized to use any or all reserve components of the Army of the United States and retired personnel of the Regular Army to such extent and in such manner as he may deem necessary for the proper observance, safeguarding, and enforcement of the neutrality of the United States, and for the strengthening of the national defense.

By that joint resolution it was proposed if during a time when the Congress was not in session a certain contingency should develop, that the President should be clothed with certain power; but that has been entirely dropped. As I said the other day, there is not one word in the pending measure, from start to finish, relative to training. We are repealing the provisions to which I have referred, and are clothing the President, without any further action on the part of the Congress, with the right to order these men into the active military service of the United States, and, as the measure now stands, anywhere in the Western Hemisphere or the possessions of the United States, including the Philippine Islands.

What for? For training? Oh, no; not for training. For active military service to such extent, with or without their consent—and that meets the decision of the Supreme Court—and in such manner as the President may deem necessary, for the strengthening of the national defense.

Nothing is said about training. Any man who has had anything to do with National Guard service knows that these units can be trained under the provision the Constitution has imposed on the States, according to the discipline which the Congress is authorized to prescribe. But, aside from the question of policy or advisability, there are differences of opinion as to that. I can understand such differences of opinion, but I cannot understand the proposed unfairness to these men. Every one of them signed an enlistment blank, and if I wanted to impose on the Senate I would read the oath they take. Under the conditions prescribed by law they were ready and are ready to go into the Federal service, to be ordered in when the Congress of the United States declares an emergency and declares that it is necessary to use additional troops. Under the limitations laid down, they are ready to go in; but those men sacrifice themselves. They sacrifice their business, they sacrifice their social conveniences in the local communities, and they give freely of themselves, month in and month out, in this service. Now, by this proposed legislation, even if it were wise and justified as a matter of policy, we are imposing on these men duties and obligations which do not pertain to their neighbors next door who have taken no steps along this line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. GILLETTE. I shall not even use my time on the joint resolution, except to close, Mr. President.

As I have said, I am covering the same ground that has been already covered here; but to me this proposal is manifestly unfair. To me there is not a shadow of justification for it. My colleagues argue speciously and with sophistry that we must not create such a situation as will be notification to the world that we are not ready to back up the superb work of Secretary Hull and his assistants, in connection with the other representatives of the pan-American republics, at Habana. Nothing can be further from the case. Nothing can be more unfair than that. My colleagues, I say that, while I know they intend no unfairness, nothing can be more unfair than that. We are ready to go. We are ready to take any step that is necessary to maintain that declaration of principle; and I, for one, urged it. I visited the State Department and urged, with my poor power, such steps as have been taken, and we are ready to back them up; but those who advocate this proposal are doing two things. They are proposing that we abdicate our power and confer on the President of the United States full power to go far beyond the present law, and order these men anywhere he sees fit, within the limitations of the joint resolution, not for training but for such purposes as he sees fit, Perhaps other Senators want to do it. If so, very well. I do not. But, over and beyond that, those who favor such action are imposing on a group of the most patriotic and finest young men the country affords, both in the National Guard of the United States and in the Reserve Corps, obligations which they are not imposing on the other citizens of the United States.

It is all very well to say, "We have adopted a policy under which we are urging these men to leave the service." They have no inherent right to leave until their resignations are accepted; and, as I said the other day in answer to an inquiry from the distinguished Senator from Colorado, the American boy does not live who is worthy the name of American manhood who will sign his name to an enlistment blank and aline himself with a local organization and go into training under the rules laid down, and, when the time comes that there is a call in the face of possible danger, hand in his resignation. He will not do it. American manhood is made of finer stuff.

Because of these two considerations, Mr. President, I find myself unable to support the proposal. I shall support the amendment offered, and I hope it will be adopted; but whether it is adopted or not, I shall vote against the pending joint resolution.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I want to make an observation and see whether or not the Senator concurs. As I understand, the Senator is standing firmly on the provisions of our Federal Constitution.

Mr. GILLETTE. Absolutely.

Mr. ADAMS. That Constitution was drafted by men who were students of history, students of government, who were cognizant of the things which had happened in turbulent times, in critical times, and who sought to put into the hands of the Congress the war power. They did not mean to make a distinction, to say that Congress should merely have the power to declare war, while the Executive had the power to make war. They, representing the people, representing the boys who would have to fight any war, meant, did they not, to put into the hands of Congress the power to decide whether or not war should be made?

Mr. GILLETTE. The Senator is absolutely correct; and in addition to taking that position, they wrote it into the Constitution of the United States, and it has been so interpreted by the courts.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I hold a different opinion from that of the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and that of the author of the amendment, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], in the first place, about the contract into which every member of these reserve components has entered and about the question of equity. The charge was made a moment ago of unfairness to these men, and a similar charge was made yesterday by the author of the amendment in the following language—I read from page 9991 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> I will say to the Senator from Michigan—and this is the last thing I shall have to say—that I cannot comprehend the Congress of the United States being willing to entrust to anybody the power to send outside the domain presided over by the Congress and the President boys who enlisted in the National Guard from patriotic motives, motives of State loyalty.

Later on he said:

> We are drafting a new law in reference to carrying these particular men into service, and we are putting into the law as it stands authority to take them anywhere in the Western Hemisphere. I think it is fairly open to implication that in peacetime the Regular Army may not be sent out of the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. President, let the contract be considered. Here is the oath of the National Guard man of the United States. I read from page 95 of the pamphlet entitled "The National Defense Act:"

> I do hereby acknowledge to have voluntarily enlisted this _____ day of _____, 19__, as a soldier in the National Guard of the United States and of the State of _____, for the period of 3 (or 1) year__, under the conditions prescribed by law, unless sooner discharged by proper authority. And I do solemnly swear that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America and to the State of _____, and that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies whomsoever, and that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States and of the Governor of the State of _____, and of the officers appointed over me according to law and the rules and Articles of War.

Mr. President, I have before me at least one decision of a district court of the United States, one decision of a circuit court of appeals of the United States, and one decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, dealing with the relationship of the member of the National Guard of the United States to his country under that contract. In effect it is held that he is a part of the Army of the United States, and, as such, enjoys the same rights and is under the same obligations as every other man in the Army of the United States, whether he is a member of the standing Army, whether he is a member of the Organized Reserves, or whether he is a member of the National Guard of the United States. Every one of them, under the law, until this joint resolution shall be enacted, is bound by his contract and his oath to the same degree and to the same obligation to serve on foreign soil if ordered to do so.

What the amendment as it stands, and before it shall be amended, does is to place a limitation upon that obligation. The joint resolution does not do what the distinguished author of the pending amendment says, that is, "We are putting into the law as it stands authority to take them anywhere in the Western Hemisphere."

It is exactly the opposite of that. Under the law they can be taken anywhere in the Western Hemisphere unless discrimination in their favor is made by this joint resolution. The joint resolution would create a new status which does not exist under the law for members of the National Guard of the United States and other reserve components of the Army of the United States. They would be protected against being sent everywhere else in the world where every other member of the Army of the United States can be sent. So far as I am acquainted with National Guard members—and I think I have quite a close personal acquaintance with many of them—they are not asking for this discrimination, and they will not like it if it is forced upon them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator referred to the joint resolution. He means the amendment now pending, if adopted, would do that?

Mr. AUSTIN. The amendment now pending if adopted would do that, and the joint resolution now pending does discriminate, for as to that part of the Army of the United States it is a limitation, and provides that the members shall not do something. It is not an extension of authority.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, would not the Senator prefer, then, to have that limitation removed from the committee's joint resolution?

Mr. AUSTIN. I would.

Mr. LEE. So would I. I agree with what the Senator says.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate long, but I desire to call attention to a short extract from each of the three decisions to which I have referred, showing that the enlistment of every one of these members of the National Guard of the United States contemplates service on foreign soil. By their oaths they undertake to perform according to the law of the United States, and the decision I have in my hand was a part of the law of the United States to which they obligated themselves.

The first case to which I refer was decided November 13, 1917, in the United States District Court of the District of Delaware, United States against Stephens, reported in 245 Federal Reporter 956. I shall read a part from page 959, as follows:

It is not denied, but conceded, that the Regular Army as constituting part of the permanent Military Establishment of the United States may be compelled to render military service abroad. But it is asserted that this obligation results from the fact that the soldiers of the Regular Army in their contract of enlistment consent to such service, and that without such consent they could not constitutionally be sent abroad to take part in the war. In other words, it is contended that, however exigent the demand for military operations on a large scale in Europe, however inadequate the Regular Army to conduct those operations, the Government is powerless in this dire struggle between democracy and a powerful autocracy practicing the atrocities of barbarism and threatening the freedom of the world to compel anyone not belonging to the permanent military forces of the Nation, to fight for this country in the only place where, perchance, his efforts may be of avail. Were such the case, the American Nation would present a pitiable spectacle of emasculated sovereignty. But I regard the contention as utterly unsound. The fundamental right of self-preservation forbids any construction of the Constitution so limiting powers of Congress essential to continued national existence.

I omit part of the page and come down to this——

Mr. WILEY. What judge rendered that opinion?

Mr. AUSTIN. It was rendered by Judge Bradford. I continue to read:

The provisions of the Constitution relating to the militia having application only to the organized State militia, it does not follow, from the lack of power in Congress to send such militia to fight in a foreign country, that Congress has not power to organize the militia of the United States and send it to any part of the globe deemed best for the conduct of military operation. There is no necessary or logical connection between the two propositions. The militia of the United States, as defined in the act of June 3, 1916, is sufficiently inclusive to embrace most, if not all, of the individuals composing the militia, organized or unorganized, of the several States. But should they, by conscription, be drafted into an army destined for foreign parts they would necessarily lose the character of organized State militia, and the implied constitutional inhibition against calling out the organized State militia except to "execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion" would cease to apply.

There is more, and I ask unanimous consent to have the remainder of the paragraph and another paragraph inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The power of Congress to declare war and raise armies is absolute and paramount, and must be recognized, even if the exercise of the power interferes with the organization of the State militia in such manner as to leave no subject to which the inhibition can apply. That power infinitely transcends, in importance, the retention of organization of State militia with the result that it can be used for no useful purpose, except the accomplishment of the three specified objects within or substantially within the national domain.

* * * * * * *

I am satisfied that Congress under the power to declare war, to raise armies, and do all things necessary and proper for the execution of that power, has full constitutional authority by conscription to organize the militia of the United States for foreign warfare, and, as incident to the exercise of that authority, to provide for and enforce the registration of those liable to service. Further, it does not appear that the army the Government is engaged in raising may not be used to "execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," as well as to serve abroad; and it is not denied that for the former purposes the militia of the United States may be compelled to register and render military service.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is a part of the contract of every man who took that oath to his country.

Here is another part of it. This is in a decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the First Circuit, Aldrich delivering the opinion of the court. There was a dissenting opinion by Putnam. The title of the case is Sweetser against Emerson. It is reported in Two Hundred and Thirty-sixth Federal Reports, page 161. I am reading now from page 166:

Under the theory of ample Federal constitutional power through Congress to organize, reorganize, and discipline the organized militia of the States, and upon the theory of adequate means of segregation under the provisions of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, through military orders, there are no obvious reasons for not merging those who voluntarily elect to enter upon the broader and longer service into units of the National Guard for service both within and beyond the national boundaries; and under the same theory we see no reason why those who elect not to enter upon the broader and longer service, but must serve the term for which they enlisted, may not be lawfully merged into designated military units for service in the narrower field contemplated by the original enlistment within the boundaries, and for the purpose of protecting the national borders from invasions and of suppressing insurrection.

Mr. President, there are several other paragraphs dealing with service abroad by the National Guard of the United States. I ask unanimous consent to have them inserted in the RECORD at this point without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

There is no occasion to go much into the history of the earlier discussions as to what constitute the primary militia, as distinct from the organized militia, or much into the earlier controversies as to the power of the President to use the organized State militia as a Federal military force, because, as stated by the learned judge of the district court, and indeed as conceded, unless existing obligations were dissolved by the act of Congress of 1916, the petitioner was bound under his engagement of service to respond to the call of the President and render service when needed to suppress insurrections within the national domain, or to repel invasions.

No question being made here against the idea that the organized militia and the National Guard of the States, under laws and obligations existing prior to June 3, 1916, might be invoked by the President as a military force for certain Federal purposes within the national domain, we have no occasion to refer to that aspect of Government military strength further than to refer to the power as something which had existence as a Government force, to be called out by the President through the Governors of States, and used under military orders in such fields as the prior laws and the nature of the engagement for service contemplated.

Obviously, the National Guard, as distinctively classified and standardized, is intended to be a constituent part of the broader organization known as the Army of the United States; but that being so by no means necessarily carries with it the idea that the organized militia and National Guard of the several States may not be distinctively recognized as military forces to be mobilized under constitutional military orders, regulations, and designations, and, being organized into military units for the unexpired term, may not be utilized for defending the national bounds and for suppressing insurrection within.

The act of 1916, being one for national defense, and one for more effectual provisions to that end, and Congress, upon its passage, being under the weight of well-known existing conditions of foreign menace, and in the presence of a recent invasion by an organized military body of armed men from a foreign country, the view is an impossible one that Congress intended to make it optional with the whole, or any substantial part, of the organized military force of the States, under obligation to aid the Federal Government in repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection, to march or not, at will, in furtherance of the duty which they had previously assumed, and for which they had been maintained in part by the Government making the emergency call for help.

It is our conclusion that the so-called National Defense Act of 1916 was intended to give greater efficiency and effectiveness to the Federal military force, through classification and standardization under military regulations and orders based upon existing rights and obligations, rather than one intended to operate to the end that members of the organized militia, and of the National Guard of the States, who do not see fit to voluntarily enlist for a longer term and assume the broader obligations which might require them to go beyond the national bounds, should be absolved from the duty of responding to the emergency call of the President and the mobilization orders of the Governor in discharge of the obligations into which they had entered, and from the narrower service which they had already assumed under existing laws, that of serving a specified term within the national domain under the lawful orders of the President.

It results, therefore, that when the petitioner had elected not to enlist for the longer term and for the broader service, though not recognized as distinctively a member of the National Guard, that he was still in the service for the Federal purposes contemplated at the time he enlisted in the Massachusetts militia and took the oath to obey all laws and regulations for the government of the volunteer militia of the Commonwealth, to obey the orders of all officers, and support the Constitution of the United States.

The petitioner being in service for such Federal purposes, he was not entitled to be discharged upon habeas corpus.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Supreme Court of the United States in dealing with this subject, referred to the background of this commonplace rule and understanding and contract. At page 378 of Two Hundred and Forty-fifth United States Reports, Chief Justice White, rendering the opinion in the Selective Draft Law Cases, said this:

It may not be doubted that the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need and the right to compel it.

And, on the next page, he points out one of the roots of this obligation, of the principle I have just read. I read:

So also it is wholly unnecessary to explore the situation for the purpose of fixing the sources whence in England it came to be understood that the citizen or the force organized from the militia as such could not without their consent be compelled to render service in a foreign country, since there is no room to contend that such principle ever rested upon any challenge of the right of Parliament to impose compulsory duty upon the citizen to perform military duty wherever the public exigency exacted, whether at home or abroad. This is exemplified by the present English Service Act.

I ask unanimous consent that other paragraphs in this opinion, which I have marked, may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

The act proposed to raise a national army, first, by increasing the regular force to its maximum strength and there maintaining it; second, by incorporating into such army the members of the National Guard and National Guard Reserve already in the service of the United States (Act of Congress of June 3, 1916, c. 134, 39 Stat. 211) and maintaining their organizations to their full strength; * * * It may not be doubted that the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need and the right to compel it. * * * Because the power of Congress to raise armies was not required to be exerted to its full limit but only as in the discretion of Congress it was deemed the public interest required, furnishes no ground for supposing that the complete power was lost by its partial exertion. Because, moreover, the power granted to Congress to raise armies in its potentiality was susceptible of narrowing the area over which the militia clause operated, affords no ground for confounding the two areas which were distinct and separate to the end of confusing both the powers and thus weakening or destroying both.

Mr. AUSTIN. That was the law to which every member of the National Guard of the United States subscribed. It was a part of his obligation and his contract. As I have already said in answer to a question by the Senator from Oklahoma, I should prefer not to start out at this time with a proviso that discriminates in favor of any part of the Army of the United States. I visualize this proposed legislation as a part of the great effort that we owe to society to provide for national defense, not merely to obtain temporary immunity from war at this moment, but having in view the future, Mr. President, which rational men ought not to omit to consider at this instant.

I regard this piece of legislation a necessary part of legislation which is to come and that which has been already passed with reference to setting up such a force, such a military and naval establishment in the United States, that no nation will dare to attack the United States or to attack her rights. I say, Mr. President, that when it comes to meeting, as we are meeting and will all the more meet from day to day, the world revolution which has overthrown the republics of Europe, our voice as a leader of thought in the world, our voice as the only great Nation which still holds aloft the torch of liberty, will have some sanction behind it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does not the Senator distinguish between a situation where we are called upon by the President of the United States to get the National Guard into the Federal service for the purpose of training, and another situation where we are in danger of going to war or being invaded? I have a feeling that there is enough territory possessed by the United States of America to train our soldiers of all branches of the service. I do not recall that any nation, even any of the aggressor nations, has used the territory of some other country to train its soldiers before they ever faced an emergency.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I would answer that question in the affirmative. But let me make this reservation: I regard the situation as one of extreme peril. I do not know what moment there will be an explosion in this hemisphere which cannot help but affect our country. Are we going to paralyze the sovereignty of this country simply because we are unwilling to trust the President of the United States and Commander in Chief of the Army to exercise the authority contained in this proposed act? It is an act which gives added authority to the President over what he has by any other law. It says to him, "Now, without waiting for a declaration of an emergency by Congress, and without waiting for Congress to say to you that it knows the standing Army is inadequate for the purposes, you may go ahead and use the Reserve components of the Army of the United States, if necessary."

I do not expect he is going to send any of them into a foreign land unless there is cause for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Vermont has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I take some time further on the joint resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for that purpose.

Mr. AUSTIN. Of course, the President is not going to war without cause. What man would do such a thing? He is not going to send Reserve components of the Army of the United States into a foreign land unless it is necessary to do so. Some one must have authority to do so instantly, without calling into session the Congress of the United States. Who should have that authority? Under our Constitution, the officer in whom it is exclusively vested should have it. I am not for one part of the Constitution while kicking another part of it. I am for it all.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know the Senator will agree with me when I say that if the emergency were acute, the National Guard of the United States and of the several States is now in no position to perform any service. The President would be compelled to call upon the Regular Army, the air force, and the Navy.

When the call is for training, I cannot bring myself to the position of saying that we may not train the National Guard of the United States in the United States. I want to train them as thoroughly and as speedily as possible.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I can say "Yes" again. The Senator's statements are perfectly correct. If that were all there were to the joint resolution, we could stand together. All we need to do by the joint resolution is to authorize the President to call out the Reserve components of the Army for the purpose of training. We can do it. We have the authority to do it.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is what was asked for.

Mr. AUSTIN. But that is not what we are doing. We are doing much more than that. We are calling them out with such power in the President that they may be used in the service if necessary. That is the idea.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not lack confidence in the President. I do not feel that the President would abuse the authority; but I am unable to bring myself to subscribe to the view held by some of my colleagues that we must necessarily be swept off our feet if any portion of the Western Hemisphere is molested. If such portions of the Western Hemisphere are molested as place in danger the rights and property of the people of the United States—that is, if they are close enough to warrant our becoming involved in trouble—then I should say, all right; but we are asked to approve a proposal to train.

Mr. AUSTIN. And more, too.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hold the view that we have enough territory in the United States and its possessions adequately to train the National Guard of the United States. Congress will remain in session. If an emergency should arise which it is beyond the power of the forces which the President has at his command to meet, I should join the Senator if there were danger; but I cannot bring myself to the position of disagreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, which provides for calling the National Guard for training in the United States and its possessions.

It seems to me to be a simple proposal. We are to train the National Guard in the United States and its possessions. We are not going to hunt war; we are not going to hunt trouble. I am anxious to protect the Monroe Doctrine; but, the way it has spread cut, it goes too far for me. It has been extended so far that not only is it not practicable to enforce it, but it is absolutely impossible.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I think the comment about the Monroe Doctrine is justified. We do much talking, but little acting. The Monroe Doctrine is not inflexible. It does not require the United States to intervene if one country transfers land to another country, or even if the dangerous thing which the Monroe Doctrine expressly speaks about occurs, and an attempt is made by a totalitarian power to plant its doctrines in this hemisphere. We have not promised by the Monroe Doctrine to intervene even in that case. All we have said is that such circumstances may be a cause for our intervention. We are in the attitude which America, thank God, has always maintained in her international relations, with her hands free and unfettered, free to adapt her action with reference to her neighboring nations to the known circumstances and dangers. I want to have America always free. That is why I strenuously object to tying her hands either by a permanent treaty or by a restrictive statute.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does not the Senator agree that Trinidad, for example, might well change hands, and that we might be just as well off with Trinidad in the hands of some other power than the one which now holds it? We should not become so excited as to feel that we must go to war because we are obligated generally on the theory that the Monroe Doctrine binds us to the proposition that we do not like colonization of possessions in this hemisphere, and that we will not stand for it.

Some other power, which might not be any more unfriendly than the power which now has Trinidad, might take it. If that were the case, we might let the other power have it and not say a word about it.

I think we should attend to our own business so far as we can, and keep other nations from taking possessions which are near enough to us to cause us possible trouble and harm.

Mr. AUSTIN. To answer the Senator, it would make all the difference in the world with me what the circumstances of the taking of Trinidad were. If Trinidad and other insular possessions now owned and held by countries which are friendly to the United States were to be taken by a victor who is unfriendly to us, who has already commenced the attack on us and on the Western Hemisphere, I should favor putting a stop to it. I should favor absolutely preventing it. I want to see the United States strong enough so that if Germany wins she will not try to take Trinidad or any other insular possession within striking distance of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. CHANDLER. I agree with the Senator that if any power should, by taking Trinidad or some other possession, thereby create a danger to us, we should be strong enough to resist.

Mr. AUSTIN. Exactly.

Mr. CHANDLER. If trouble comes, then it were well that it come quickly. I agree with that; but we do much talking about how far we shall go. I am not so certain that we are always right in agreeing to go further than we would actually go unless we were placed in danger by the action.

Mr. AUSTIN. I lock hands with the Senator on that statement. Let us not commit ourselves in our foreign relations to such an extent that we cannot strike with all our might when it becomes necessary to do so.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I am sure the Senator is familiar with the draft law which was passed in Canada a short time ago.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I have never read it.

Mr. WHEELER. My information is—I am not sure about it, but I have it from a reliable source—that when Canada passed the draft law, it provided that the men should be used only in Canada for home defense. It seems to me we are going much further than did Canada.

I know the Senator is in favor of conscription. I wish to call his attention to the fact that in the last war, even when the British Empire was at war, along about 1916 or 1917, Australia actually took a vote on the question. All the newspapers in Australia were in favor of the draft law. However, the question was submitted to a referendum, and the people of Australia turned down the proposal.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is hardly in point.

Mr. WHEELER. It is certainly in point so far as Canada is concerned. Canada passed a law drafting men, and provided that they should not be sent beyond the borders of Canada.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask the Senator if he does not think that when the National Guard and Reserve officers are called out they will then become a part of the Army of the United States?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do.

Mr. GIBSON. After they have become a part of the Army of the United States, can Congress in any way command them?

Mr. AUSTIN. It cannot.

Mr. GIBSON. Then, how can the Congress say to the President of the United States, "You may use part of your Army in this country and part of it overseas?" Is not that an unconstitutional infringement of the power of the Commander in Chief of our forces?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is not the way I view the joint resolution. I have looked upon it as I have looked upon the two statutes relating to calling out the militia and ordering out the militia. Congress has said, "Mr. President, you may call out the militia on condition." As I understand the joint resolution, it is proposed to say, "You may call out the militia on another and different condition." If that is a correct interpretation of it, we are not beyond our powers.

I comprehend the question asked by my colleague. It has real merit, and I admit that I have not thought it through.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. GIBSON. It seems to me that the provision of the joint resolution limiting the service to the Western Hemisphere should not be in the joint resolution at all, because it seems to me that is an act of Congress commanding the Army, and saying that the President may not use part of the Army outside the country, or wherever he sees fit.

Mr. AUSTIN. I appreciate the observation of my colleague, and I thank him.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Reverting to the interjection of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], I do not think the situation in Canada is apropos. I have not read the Canadian draft law, but I recall reading a few days ago that Canada is training 300,000 men for overseas duty. I do not know whether they are to be volunteers or whether they are going in under the Canadian draft law. But even if Canada had passed a law of that sort it does not in any way approximate our situation, because Canada has taken on no obligation of any sort, so far as I know, beyond her obligation to Canada and to the British Dominions, of which she is a part. Certainly she has taken on no Western Hemisphere obligation, and no obligation even to protect herself against aggression in other parts of the Americas.

I do not see the application of any Canadian law to our situation.

Mr. AUSTIN. That brings out the point I was trying to make. The cold fact is that the National Defense Act of 1916, and its subsequent amendments in 1920 and 1933, were all in effect when nearly every man who is now a member of the National Guard of the United States made his contract, and they are all a part of his contract.

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely. That is the position I take.

Let me ask the Senator then, referring to the colloquy with my colleague with regard to Trinidad, which, I presume, was taken merely as an example——

Mr. AUSTIN. It must have been, for there are many others.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are many other islands in that section of the world, but let us take Trinidad. It is possible, of course, that authority and jurisdiction over Trinidad might be taken over by some nation for no ulterior purpose, for its economic development, and without involving any threat against any part of the Americas; but, under the Monroe Doctrine, under our solemn resolution unanimously adopted, and the policy which we have pursued and in which we believe, would it not be our duty scrupulously to scrutinize such a transfer of authority even over Trinidad, for how can we tell, however innocently the transaction might appear at the time, whether in a year or two or in 5 years the use of that island might be devoted entirely to the establishment of an unfriendly base from which operations could be carried on against the entire Americas?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, we are on notice; we have been on notice for a long time of the aggressive, dynamic foreign policy of the totalitarian states, with world dominion as their objective, and specifically of their having entered the Western Hemisphere and organized a system of education, a system of military training, a system of depots where the exchange of commercial airplanes into military planes, could be made. We are on notice; we know all about it; and how unwise, how imprudent we would be if we did not act, and act as promptly as possible.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me also refer to the fact that we cannot always rely on newspaper reports as being accurate, but I recently noticed in the press a dispatch to the effect that negotiations are now in progress between one of the totalitarian governments and one of its victims with reference to the transfer of the island of Martinique, which is in as dangerous position to the Americas as is Trinidad.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I have finished.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS]. I suppose the reason for including the provision in the joint resolution providing for the limitation of the National Guard, limiting their sphere to the Western Hemisphere, was intended as a compromise in order to quiet the fears of some that we might be planning another expeditionary force. I say I suppose that was the reason for it, but the amendment of the Senator from Colorado limiting the field in which the National Guard could be ordered to the territory of the United States is not a compromise; it is a surrender. It is a surrender of the Monroe Doctrine. In my opinion, it would deal a damaging blow to the prestige of the United States at this time. It would be an invitation to the totalitarian powers to start at once upon the establishment of military bases in South America. It would be an announcement to the world that the United States has abandoned a doctrine to which we have adhered for 150 years, a doctrine which the other nations of the world respect. But in this one amendment we would bow out and say in effect to the totalitarian powers, "The field is yours." Then the totalitarian powers would begin to move in. They would establish one base. The Nazi disease germ is like creeping paralysis. It would not be long until the continent south of the Panama Canal would be occupied by totalitarian powers. Where would that growing cancer stop? The place to stop it is before it crosses the line into the Western Hemisphere.

In 1917 the United States fought for the right of freemen to govern themselves. We still believe in that doctrine. We have, however, decided to limit the territory of our enforcement of that doctrine to the Western Hemisphere, but I am unwilling that we should retreat further, draw the line at the Mexican border, and invite the totalitarian powers to come to South America and begin there establishing their bases from which to strike at the United States.

Mr. President, we have a National Guard in the United States, and the Federal Government has spent a great amount of money on the National Guard. It is made up of the finest men to be found in the country. Today we are facing an emergency. If we are not, then, in my opinion, some Senators who do not believe we are facing an emergency convict themselves of extravagance by voting money that is unnecessary when they voted billions of dollars for national defense here without even an opposing voice, without an opposing vote. If we are not facing an emergency, there is no use for the joint resolution at all. But we are facing an emergency, and we want to give the President power to order out the National Guard.

Under the law, when the National Guard is ordered out it becomes a part of the Army of the United States. In my opinion, the amendment of the Senator from Colorado puts these men under one dispensation and the Regular Army of the United States under another.

Suppose, for example, that some of the members of the National Guard are made a part of a military organization as officers and an emergency arises because of which it is necessary for the President, as Commander in Chief of that organization, to order it to Panama; would it not be necessary, if this amendment were adopted, to remove from that organization all the men who had come into the Regular Army from the National Guard under this measure?

We would have two kinds of national armies if this amendment were adopted.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I intend to vote for the Adams amendment because it is my view that if the necessity ever arises to send the National Guard outside continental United States, it is a decision in which the Congress should specifically participate. I intend to vote for the pending joint resolution, with or without the Adams amendment, because it recognizes the traditional peacetime American method of preparing against emergencies. In other words, I shall support the joint resolution for precisely the same reason that I shall oppose peacetime conscription as a primary recourse for the first time in 150 years of American history and tradition. If and when the primary and traditional peacetime methods fail—and there is no present proof of it—then I shall join in a resort to compulsion, and I shall join when there is yet time. But it must be the last and necessary recourse, and not the first and unnecessary recourse.

Mr. President, since I am supporting the joint resolution, I desire to put into the RECORD information which seems to be essential to quiet the fears of a number of earnest citizens of the country. One of the almost constant complaints that have come to me in my mail is the fear that men who are taken into the National Army, through the National Guard or otherwise, will be deprived of their voting privilege. I think this idea is very generally held.

I have before me the George Washington Law Review for December 1939, which deals, with that subject; and for the purpose of the RECORD I want to present its conclusions upon the subject.

The Law Review says that the following general conclusions may be drawn regarding the suffrage right of the soldier and the sailor:

1. A soldier or sailor of the United States is not deprived of his right to vote by reason of his Federal employment.

There are one or two exceptions to that generalization. According to the footnotes and the text, it appears that Texas is the one State which absolutely has excluded military men from any right to the elective franchise. The Law Review reads as follows:

Texas, unlike any other State, classes soldiers, marines, and seamen with idiots, lunatics, paupers, and convicts in denying them the right to vote.

This clause in the Constitution apparently was amended in 1932 so as to allow reserves, and retired officers and enlisted men, to vote; but the footnote also says on that subject:

Members of the Texas National Guard while actively employed in the service of the United States Army, however, cannot vote.

And apparently the matter has been adjudicated in the case of Savage v. Umphries (118 S. W. 893).

There is a possible argument as to whether or not soldiers and sailors from the State of Missouri may vote. There seems to be a constitutional question which is unliquidated; but, with these two exceptions, the fundamental fact remains that a soldier or sailor of the United States is not deprived of his right to vote by reason of his Federal employment.

The second general conclusion presented is that—

His domicile is unchanged by a mere change of station of duty, even for years.

The third general conclusion is that—

He has the same right to make a change of domicile as that possessed by any other citizen.

The fourth generalization is:

If he is otherwise qualified to vote, he may exercise that right at the place of his domicile.

The fifth and final generalization is that—

If the law of his domicile permits absentee voting, he may avail himself of that right by compliance with that law.

This generalization, in turn, requires a reservation. Of course, the practical privilege of voting depends entirely upon whether the State of the voter's origin has an absentee voters' law, because except as the soldier or sailor could be released from his assignment away from his domicile to vote in person, he could vote only by absentee ballot. Therefore, returning again to the footnotes in the Law Review, it is important to note under this generalization that there are six States which do not have absentee ballot privileges; namely, the States of Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Mississippi, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. Therefore in those six States the right to vote of the conscript or the National Guard man covered into the national service is more apparent than real.

This seems to be the situation regarding the right of the soldier and sailor to vote; and I have thought it important to spread the information on the RECORD in view of the very large national interest in the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. SHEPPARD obtained the floor.

Mr. WAGNER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield for that purpose?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, if Congress has faith in its Army to defend the United States it should not hamper its planning and operations.

To properly defend this country of ours it is necessary for the Army, in view of what has happened in Europe, to lay plans which, if conditions warrant or demand it, might necessitate elements of the armed forces of the United States extending its power to any part of the Western Hemisphere to preclude foreign powers from gaining a foothold in the Western Hemisphere.

Time might be an essential factor in frustrating the plans of a foreign power which might attempt invasion of part of the Western Hemisphere. Even 1, 2, or 3 days' delay might throw the advantage to an enemy. Hence, it would not be safe under some circumstances to wait for the action of Congress even for 1 day.

At the Habana Conference the United States joined with other American countries for the protection of the Western Hemisphere. We should now reinforce that agreement by authorizing the National Guard to go anywhere in the Western Hemisphere with or without the Regular Army.

Thorough protection of the United States in the present day cannot be carried out without protecting the Western Hemisphere. From a military point of view the restriction contemplated by the pending amendment would seriously interfere with the plans of our armed forces for the protection of the United States. It would be folly to restrict the planning and operation of the Army of the United States, of which the National Guard of the United States is a fundamental part.

If the National Guard men are to come into the service contemplated by the joint resolution, let them come on equal terms with the Regular Army soldier by whose side they are to stand. Let us not say to them, as the amendment would say, that they come into the service presumably as soldiers under the Nation's flag but that they cannot go where the Regular soldiers go in carrying out the vital policies of the Nation. They are technically full-fledged soldiers in the Federal service, but in reality, under the amendment, they would be only halfway soldiers, so far as the real work of the Nation may be concerned. I am sure they would resent a discrimination of this kind.

The enactment of the amendment would be to say to South America that if its security and liberty should be threatened by a European power we have deliberately crippled our ability to come immediately to its assistance by the enactment of a law forbidding about half of our forces from being utilized for this purpose, from holding back invading forces until Congress could decide the matter of declaring war, perhaps after an interminable debate in the United States Senate.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Assuming that the Congress passes the conscription law, will it be the policy of the War Department to fuse into the National Guard part of the men who are taken in under the Draft Act?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Only for the training year.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator means only those who go into the draft will be fused into the National Guard?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not permanently, but only for whatever part of the training year remains.

Mr. MILLER. But is it not to be the policy of the War Department, and has it not already been announced, that they would use the National Guard as a nucleus of training?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is very true.

Mr. MILLER. Then I am wondering what the committee meant by inserting the proviso to which the Adams amendment is directed, the proviso on page 2, lines 2 to 7. What was the purpose of inserting that proviso in the joint resolution at all?

Mr. SHEPPARD. To notify the administration and the world of our opposition against going outside the Western Hemisphere, with the exceptions included in the proviso, with either the Army or the National Guard.

Mr. MILLER. Was that the purpose of it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That was my purpose.

Mr. MILLER. As a matter of fact, it would not have that effect if the administration desired to send them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not think the President would give any consideration to sending our troops outside the Western Hemisphere with this expression of the opinion of Congress in the law.

Mr. MILLER. I see; it is to be taken as an expression of the opinion of Congress?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is it.

Mr. REYNOLDS obtained the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator wishes to address the Senate, I shall not trespass upon his time.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am very happy to accommodate the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I am pleased to have the opinion of the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER]. I read with interest the speech of the able Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS]. I listened with interest and pride to the speech just delivered by the able chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD].

As I view the proviso on page 2, lines 2 to 7, it is nothing more than a pious wish; the expression of an earnest hope. It expresses a hope in which I share. I may be wrong, but my view is that Congress may declare war, raise and support armies, but the President commands the Army. The President is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and may send the Army wherever he chooses.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I always yield to the able Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I should like to have the Senator tell me whether he thinks the Constitution gives Congress the right to impose limitations. Congress is given the power not only to raise armies, but "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." I should like to know whether or not that does not enable the Congress to say to the President, the Commander in Chief, "There are these limitations."

Mr. ASHURST. I could wish that the able Senator from Colorado had addressed his question to some Senator more learned on constitutional questions than am I; but to answer the able Senator to the best of my ability, I repeat, I doubt very much whether under the Constitution we may limit the evolutions of the Army. The Army may be sent wherever the President chooses.

Congress declares war, but the President conducts the war. Therefore we ought now to be put on notice that when we vote for the pending measure, even though the amendment of the able Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] should prevail, or with the proviso which the committee, I believe, wisely incorporated, the President nevertheless would have the power to send the Army wherever he chose. In the face of this solemn declaration by Congress, expressed in respectful and proper language, to the effect that Congress is of opinion that United States troops, our Army, these men here referred to, should not be sent beyond the boundaries of the Western Hemisphere, I am quite certain that no President would, except in most extreme emergencies, transcend this expression of Congress.

I am under no illusions; I know it is not binding on anyone. I repeat it is an expression of opinion or desire and has no effect in law. While it is but an expression of opinion, it is a wise and a timely expression, that we want no troops, no American soldiers, sent to Europe.

The fault I find with the proviso is that it says that these troops shall not be sent beyond the limits of the Western Hemisphere, and I will say, for the third time, we should define the expression "Western Hemisphere" if we are to use such phrase. Forsooth, able Senators say that it is difficult to define the Western Hemisphere. That is all the more reason why Congress should define "Western Hemisphere."

If the Senator from North Carolina will further indulge me——

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not an expert on the Monroe Doctrine. In front of me is the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. PATMAN], chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, who is an expert on our foreign relations, who knows a vast deal more about the Monroe Doctrine than do I. But I think it is a part of my duty to my constituents and to the country that I say what I shall say about the Monroe Doctrine.

I repeat, the Monroe Doctrine works both ways. It is a two-way street. Too long have statesmen been oblivious to the fact that there are two essential parts to the Monroe Doctrine. One part is that we will not permit European powers to intermeddle with what we call cis-Atlantic affairs. The other essential part of the doctrine is that we shall not interfere in European affairs. Therefore, Mr. President, if under any contingency, if in any circumstance, the troops we are discussing or any other of our troops should be sent to a European country, we would violate that doctrine, of which we have so frequently and so stridently spoken.

It does not require a trained lawyer, it does not require a person skilled in logical analysis to perceive that when we send troops into Europe, if we do, we violate the Monroe Doctrine.

Another essential feature of the Monroe Doctrine, and one that we sometimes forget is—and it is so expressed in the doctrine—that as to European affairs we recognize or consider rather the de facto government. Under that doctrine the United States does not spin out the tangled, fine, and oblique threads and declare what is the legitimate, the de jure government in Europe. If we intend to observe the Monroe Doctrine we consider the de facto government.

I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I wish to make a motion to strike from the measure the words "including the Philippine Islands." I am under the impression that I would be entitled to have a vote upon my motion before a vote is taken upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Parliamentarian advises the Chair that the motion made by the Senator from North Carolina is not in order at this time. The Senator from Colorado having accepted that amendment to his amendment, it would be in order to move to strike the language, to which the Senator from North Carolina refers, from the Adams amendment, but not from the joint resolution itself.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I make the motion that the language be stricken from the Adams amendment, and in that situation I am still under the impression that I am entitled to a vote on that question, prior to the vote being taken on the Adams amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to state the parliamentary situation a little further. The Chair takes it the Senator desires to make a few remarks on the matter?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes; I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that if the Senator now offers his motion, it would take the Senator from North Carolina from his feet, and the Chair suggests that the Senator proceed with his remarks for the remainder of his time, and then make the motion.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Presiding Officer.

Mr. President, do I understand that there is an agreement to the effect that, regardless of any circumstances, the Senate is to vote on the joint resolution itself at 4 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That being the case, I should like to avail myself of my 20 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has consumed—or rather the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has consumed—a considerable part of the time of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I shall take my remaining 20 minutes in speaking on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 6 minutes remaining. The Chair feels under compulsion to recognize another Senator at the conclusion of that time. The time the Senator had was 20 minutes.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Of course, first, I wanted to accommodate my friend the Senator from Arizona. In the second place, I was very happy indeed to have the opportunity of yielding to him, for this morning I made inquiry as to whether or not I would be entitled to 40 minutes if I made a motion to strike from the amendment of the Senator from Colorado the words I have mentioned, and I was advised by someone who, I take it, is informed on parliamentary subjects, that in that case I would be entitled to 40 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair feels that he ought to follow as nearly as possible the request of Senators to speak in order. The present occupant of the chair recognizes the Senator from North Carolina under that arrangement. He feels that, in fairness to other Senators, he should not recognize the Senator from North Carolina the second time, and it would be necessary for the Chair to do that under the circumstances now. That would eliminate other Senators from consideration.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Desiring to weigh this matter in the scales of justice, so far as the matter of time is concerned, I should say that certainly I believe I should have more than 6 minutes, in view of the fact that, laboring under the impression that I would have 40 minutes, I yielded gladly to the Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair feels that the fact that the Senator from North Carolina yielded to the Senator from Arizona should not prevent other Senators from speaking who have requested time to speak.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I was under the impression that I had 40 minutes.

Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Chair holds that I shall have but about 3 minutes now, I wish to make a motion to strike from the amendment of the Senator from Colorado the concluding words "including the Philippine Islands." The purpose of the joint resolution is what? It is the purpose of the joint resolution to strengthen our national defense. I say that our national defense cannot be strengthened by sending soldiers 8,000 miles away from the United States, and for that reason I make the motion to strike from the amendment of the Senator from Colorado the words "including the Philippine Islands."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike from the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado the words, "including the Philippine Islands."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BARBOUR. I wish to address myself, if I may, to my amendment, which was merely read several days ago. Because of the parliamentary situation, I have had no opportunity in the meantime to explain it. I now call up and send the amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, after line 16, it is proposed to insert the following:

(b) The President shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, defer training and service in the land and naval forces of the United States of those members of the National Guard whose employment in industry, agriculture, or other occupations or employment or whose work in engineering, chemistry, physics, medicine, or dentistry are found to be necessary to the maintenance of the national health, safety, or interest. The determination of each deferment of training and service shall be made with regard to the status of the individual and shall not be made by deferring the training and service of individuals by occupational groups without regard to the status of the individual therein. The President is also directed under such regulations as he may prescribe to defer the training and service in the land and naval forces of those members of the National Guard in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their deferment advisable: Provided, That no deferment for any reason shall be approved except on application therefor by an individual member of the National Guard, in his own interest, and no deferment from service shall continue after the cause therefor ceases to exist. The President shall utilize the services of the National Guard Bureau of the War Department in the administration of this subsection (b), and the decisions of the Chief of the National Guard Bureau shall be final as to all applications for deferment of members of the National Guard.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I shall consume as little time as I possibly can, out of consideration for other Senators, because the hour of 4 o'clock, when we must vote, is near at hand. I do not think there is the slightest doubt in the minds of most Senators, I do not think there is any doubt in the minds of most people, nor do I think there is any doubt in the minds of nearly all the members of the National Guard, as to the necessity and propriety of calling out the guard under present world conditions. It is perfectly obvious, however, from the lengthy and laborious discussion that we have heard for many hours now on this subject, that there is a tremendous difference of opinion among Senators under what circumstances the National Guard should be called out for training in the Federal service.

By the same token, one of those circumstances and conditions undoubtedly is what exemptions, if any, those who find themselves unexpectedly thrust into this unusual position and these circumstances should be granted.

In light particularly of the rejection by the Senate of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], which gave members of the National Guard at least some time in which to determine what course they must pursue, because of dependents or other considerations, and in light of the fact that, as yet, we do not know whether or not the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Colorado will be adopted, it seems to me that we should certainly have at least these limitations in this measure, because while undoubtedly a certain number of members of the guard have been given an opportunity by State officers and officials to retire, and some of them have retired, yet many have not been given a chance to do so. As a matter of fact, as of today the matter of any exemptions at all in the National Guard is a very narrow one. The recent order to adjutant generals of the States permits the discharge of enlisted men only when their pay is less than approximately $70 a month. National Guard officers, however, cannot be discharged because they have dependents, although the War Department I admit will probably let them resign if they are in key positions in essential industries.

Mr. President, I am not trying to obstruct the passage of this proposed legislation. I simply feel that the approach and method of calling the guard into the Federal service is totally different than it was in 1917, when as a member of the National Guard I went to the Mexican border, and because of the very obvious difference of opinion among so many Senators as to what the obligations of the guardsmen will be, I feel that my amendment should be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS obtained the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I see how difficult it is to get consideration of amendments. There is an amendment pending here known as the Adams amendment, which is undisposed of. The amendment just offered by the Senator from New Jersey is not in order by virtue of the fact that the Adams amendment is pending.

I wish to offer an amendment which I think will be unanimously accepted. If there is to be any debate upon it, there is no use in presenting it. I offer the following amendment, to be added as subsection (f) in section 3:

Any member of the National Guard may resign his status within 20 days after ordered into the active military service of the United States if at such time he has dependent upon him a wife or child, or both, and has no means with which to support such dependent or dependents except the wages or salary he can earn.

I ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote on that amendment now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no trouble about voting on the amendment. The unanimous-consent agreement does not preclude the offering of amendments after 4 o'clock. While they may not be debated, they may be read and offered and voted upon.

Mr. PITTMAN. If there be no objection, I ask a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is a little irregular to set aside a pending amendment and vote on another amendment when it may be voted upon later.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Kentucky is quite correct; but the nature of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada is such that it may determine how some Senators may subsequently vote. It would be a most convenient and happy circumstance if we could vote on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada first. It will not affect me.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no objection, except that it is irregular, and the amendment may be voted on later. If the Senator wants a vote upon it now, I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, the amendment is acceptable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS]. The Senator from North Carolina has requested the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, may the amendment, as proposed to be amended, be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike from the amendment the words "including the Philippine Islands."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient demand for the yeas and nays?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, it occurs to me that it would be most unfortunate to adopt an amendment of this nature at this time so long as the Philippines are under our jurisdiction. It would be giving notice to them and to the world that we have practically abandoned and lost interest in them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to what seems to me to have been a very sound observation earlier in the day by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], who now occupies the chair.

It seems to me it would be most unfortunate for the Senate to take action which might be construed in the rest of the world as notice that although the Philippine Islands are still under our jurisdiction and will so continue until and unless they shall be finally freed, we do not propose to do anything in case they are attacked by some other nation. For that reason—while I hope we may never have to send any soldiers to the Philippine Islands, and it is doubtful that we ever shall—certainly we do not want to notify the world that, regardless of what happens, we are unwilling to discharge our obligation so long as the Philippines are under our jurisdiction.

I hope the amendment to the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. I understand that if he were present and voting he would vote as I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am informed that if present and voting he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. TAFT (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MILLER. My colleague [Mrs. CARAWAY] is necessarily detained from the Senate. I understand that if she were present she would vote "nay."

Mr. HILL. My colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is absent on important public business. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. MINTON. I announce the following pairs on this question:

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS], who would vote "nay"; and

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. HERRING], who would vote "yea", with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], who would vote "nay."

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is absent on official business. If present, he would vote "nay."

The Senators from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE and Mr. RUSSELL] are members of the committee to attend the funeral of the late Representative GIBBS, and are therefore necessarily absent.

The following Senators are necessarily absent:

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HERRING], the Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS].

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—38

So Mr. ADAMS' amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in view of the fact that, under the order, the Senate is compelled to vote now finally upon the joint resolution, I do not insist upon the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the amendment is stated, the Chair will state that there will be no opportunity to discuss amendments now offered. Therefore, the Chair requests both the Senate and the occupants of the galleries to preserve the best of order, so that Senators may understand the amendments as they are read. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, after line 17, following section 3, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 4. (a) The benefits of the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act, approved March 8, 1918, are hereby extended to all National Guard, Reserve, and retired personnel ordered into the active military service under authority of this joint resolution, so long as such personnel are in such service and for 60 days thereafter, and except as hereinafter provided, the provisions of such act shall be effective for such purposes.

(b) For the purposes of this section—

(1) the following provisions of such act of March 8, 1918, shall be inoperative: Section 100; and paragraphs (1), (2), and (5) of section 101; article 4; article 5; paragraph (2) of section 601; and section 603.

(2) the term "persons in military service," when used in such act, shall be deemed to mean persons ordered into the active military service under the authority of this joint resolution.

(3) the term "period of military service," when used in such act, when applicable with respect to any person, shall be deemed to mean the period beginning with the date on which such person is ordered into such active military service and ending with the date on which he is relieved from such service.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I to understand that under the unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into earlier today the Senate must now vote on the amendment which has just been read without further debate or any information about it at all?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct in his statement. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate must vote at 4 o'clock on all amendments and on the joint resolution itself without further debate.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. OVERTON. Would it be in order for the Chair to advise the Senator from Illinois that an explanation of this amendment was made earlier this afternoon by me, as its author; that it was accepted by the Senator from Texas, who has charge of the joint resolution; and that other Senators commented on it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair believes the Senator from Louisiana is out of order in attempting to explain the amendment.

Mr. OVERTON. A further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. OVERTON. May I ask the Senator from Texas if this amendment is acceptable to him?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is, Mr. President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Both the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Texas are out of order.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR. I now call up the amendment which I have discussed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, after line 16, it is proposed to insert the following:

(b) The President shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, defer training and service in the land and naval forces of the United States of those members of the National Guard whose employment in industry, agriculture, or other occupations or employment or whose work in engineering, chemistry, physics, medicine, or dentistry are found to be necessary to the maintenance of the national health, safety, or interest. The determination of each deferment of training and service shall be made with regard to the status of the individual and shall not be made by deferring the training and service of individuals by occupational groups without regard to the status of the individual therein. The President is also directed under such regulations as he may prescribe to defer the training and service in the land and naval forces of those members of the National Guard in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their deferment advisable: Provided, That no deferment for any reason shall be approved except on application therefor by an individual member of the National Guard, in his own interest, and no deferment from service shall continue after the cause therefor ceases to exist. The President shall utilize the services of the National Guard Bureau of the War Department, in the administration of this subsection (b), and the decisions of the Chief of the National Guard Bureau shall be final as to all applications for deferment of members of the National Guard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I offer a motion to recommit with instructions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be stated by the clerk.

The CHIEF CLERK. Mr. CLARK of Missouri moves to recommit Senate Joint Resolution 286 to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to report it back forthwith with an amendment as follows:

On page 2, line 5, strike out the remainder of section 1 beginning with the words "Western Hemisphere" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "continental United States and Territories and possessions of the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote. I announce that if the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], with whom I am paired, were present he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. STEWART (when his name was called). This is a motion to recommit, not a motion to reconsider?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. STEWART. A parliamentary inquiry, if I may make it. If the motion prevails, that means that the joint resolution goes back to the committee entirely?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The motion to recommit directs the committee to report forthwith. Is it not correct that under the instruction to report forthwith the chairman of the committee is under an obligation to get up immediately and present the report in accordance with the instructions of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri correctly states the parliamentary situation.

Mr. STEWART. I vote "nay."

Mr. TAFT (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO]. I am advised that if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HERRING], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is absent on official business. If present, he would vote "nay" on this question.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—31

Adams	Clark, Mo.	La Follette	Reynolds

So the motion of Mr. CLARK of Missouri to recommit with instructions was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. BARKLEY. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OVERTON (when Mr. ELLENDER's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is detained from the Senate on important business. I I am advised that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

If present all these Senators would vote "yea."

The Senators from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE and Mr. RUSSELL] are absent in attendance upon the funeral of the late Representative GIBBS. I am advised that if present and voting they would vote "yea."

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS]. If present the Senator from New Jersey would vote "yea," and the Senator from South Carolina would vote "nay."

So the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) was passed.

SENATOR HIRAM JOHNSON

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, during all the years of my public life, and many years before coming to Washington, I have had the most profound admiration for that stalwart, liberal-minded statesman, the senior Senator from California, HIRAM JOHNSON. Our association together in the Senate has been a source of great inspiration to me. At all times he has been most generous, gifted in speech, devoted to the Constitution, strong for the right as he has seen the right, and loyal to the United States in a way that has made his name a lasting symbol of faithful love of country.

It was therefore with more than ordinary interest that I read the article by David Lawrence in the Evening Star of last evening, August 7. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of August 7, 1940]

JOHNSON DEFENDED AS LIBERAL—ROOSEVELT REMARK UNFORTUNATE, WRITER HOLDS

(By David Lawrence)

President Roosevelt often makes impromptu remarks in his press conferences, which on further reflection he doubtless would not make, and one of these is the unfortunate comment to the effect Senator JOHNSON of California is no longer a liberal.

It so happens that Mr. JOHNSON is up for reelection and is a candidate in both the Republican and Democratic primaries on August 27. It so happens also that all the five candidates are entered in both primaries, a circumstance made possible by California's peculiar primary laws. It so happens also that Senator JOHNSON in 1934 in this way won both the Republican and the Democratic nominations and it would not be at all surprising if he repeated that performance this month.

The reason is simple: HIRAM JOHNSON is the greatest liberal in American public life today. No man can match his record. His career as Governor of California as a foe of the political machines and bosses has been followed by 23 years in the United States Senate, during which he has supported liberal legislation irrespective of which party sponsored it.

Specifically under the New Deal regime, the California Senator voted for the social-security law, the securities and exchange laws, and the Wagner labor relations law, as well as for a lot of minor measures of a progressive nature sponsored by the administration. The greatest act of liberalism, however, to the Senator's credit was his refusal to vote for a bill that would have permitted the President to pack the Supreme Court of the United States in the year 1937. It turned out that Mr. Roosevelt was able in subsequent years by means of vacancies to place five men on the Supreme Bench, but as for the Court bill itself HIRAM JOHNSON'S record is as clear-cut as any progressive could wish.

ISOLATIONIST ATTITUDE

The President may have been thinking about Mr. JOHNSON'S vigorous opposition to the court bill, because of which other Senators were designated for "purge" in the 1938 primaries by the New Dealers, or he may have been thinking about the Californian's well-known isolationist attitude.

This correspondent has never agreed with Senator JOHNSON'S views on foreign policy and has written again and again that the Johnson Act, forbidding credits to foreign countries defaulting on war debts was a mistaken piece of legislation, but differences of opinion on foreign questions are by no means determinative of whether a man is a conservative or a liberal or whether he is a friend of the common people or of the seekers after special privilege.

Senator JOHNSON has maintained his convictions and his principles against any and all overtures from pressure groups. The Senator takes his stand and fights honorably for his views. He is highly regarded by his colleagues in the Senate because of his fearlessness and his independence of spirit. It would be a drab world if everybody in Washington agreed on everything and it would hardly be a liberal government if the legislators were picked for public office through the influence of the Chief Executive, the retention of whose favor alone would then be a factor in the opportunity of a public man to win reelection.

A FIXTURE IN SENATE

Senator JOHNSON is as much a fixture in the United States Senate as anybody who has been there in the last 50 years. He can be counted on to fight against tyranny or despotism, whether it arises from the political bosses or the Government bosses. He is alert at 73—just as much if not more so than the present Secretary of War recently appointed, who is 72.

The test of a statesman is not whether he originates a lot of laws or puts into effect the bills of special groups, however benevolent their purposes. It is whether a legislator stands on guard against the influences, beneficent or otherwise, which sap the economic vitality of the Nation and the integrity of government itself.

Senator JOHNSON is one of those watchdogs of human liberty, who can be counted on to put aside the plaudits of the moment for what he believes in the long run is for the best interests of his country. My own prediction is that the people of California will repudiate the idea that Senator JOHNSON isn't liberal by renominating and reelecting him for another 6 years. There'll be neither fascism nor communism in the American Government so long as HIRAM JOHNSON can raise his powerful voice in the United States Senate.

REGULATION OF INVESTMENT COMPANIES AND ADVISERS

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10065, Calendar No. 2111.

Mr. McNARY. May the title of the bill be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 10065) to provide for the registration and regulation of investment companies and investment advisers, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, that is a debatable question, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. The Senator from California is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, is the bill the one in relation to increasing the capital of the R. F. C.?

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, no; I told the Senator I would not bring that bill up unless I consulted with him. This is a bill which has already passed the House of Representatives by unanimous vote. It provides for the regulation of investment trusts and investment advisers.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am not interested in that.

Mr. WAGNER. It is not the bill to which the Senator refers.

Mr. McNARY. Was there a unanimous report by the committee?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes. This bill is the result of 4 weeks of hearings, at the conclusion of which the industry and the S. E. C. sat down together, and, after consideration for 3 weeks, agreed upon its terms and provisions. I do not know of any opposition anywhere in the investment-trust industry; and the industry today is urging the proposed legislation even more strongly than is the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the only question I have heard raised is from the so-called investment counsel. Does the Senator say that they also are for the bill?

Mr. WAGNER. There was originally some opposition as to some detailed provisions. The Commission conferred with the investment advisers, as it did with the investment trusts, and they have agreed on the proposed legislation, I assure the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10065) to provide for the registration and regulation of investment companies and investment advisers, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment which is really separate from the regulation of the investment trusts. It would liberalize the Securities Act of 1933. This, too, has been agreed upon by the National Association of Security Dealers, the Investment Bankers Association, and the S. E. C. I have been instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to present the amendment. It relaxes the present provision that 20 days must elapse after an application for registration has been made before the securities may be sold.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, we have been unable to hear on this side, and I wish to ask whether the amendment is to the 30-day clause.

Mr. WAGNER. The amendment is sought—and I think it is a very fair amendment—by the security dealers and investment bankers of the country, and by the Securities and Exchange Commission, in a joint statement, which I will offer for the RECORD. It is a very simple amendment. The present law is absolutely rigid and automatic. An issuer must wait 20 days after filing his registration statement before he can offer his securities for sale. The amendment vests discretion in the S. E. C. so that an earlier date may be fixed in appropriate cases, subject to appropriate standards set forth in the amendment. That is all it would do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

TITLE III. AMENDMENT OF SECURITIES ACT OF 1933

SEC. 301. Section 8 (a) of the Securities Act of 1933, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. (a) Except as hereinafter provided, the effective date of a registration statement shall be the twentieth day after the filing thereof or such earlier date as the Commission may determine, having due regard to the adequacy of the information respecting the issuer theretofore available to the public, to the facility with which the nature of the securities to be registered, their relationship to the capital structure of the issuer and the rights of holders thereof can be understood, and to the public interest and the protection of investors. If any amendment to any such statement is filed prior to the effective date of such statement, the registration statement shall be deemed to have been filed when such amendment was filed; except that an amendment filed with the consent of the Commission, prior to the effective date of the registration statement, or filed pursuant to an order of the Commission, shall be treated as a part of the registration statement."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the bill before us, which covers 178 pages, was prepared by the Securities and Exchange Commission, and it was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Much opposition was expressed by members of different investment trusts, and then the bill was referred to the Investment Trust Association and the Securities and Exchange Commission, and various modifications were made by the Commission which were satisfactory to the Investment Trust Association. I do not, therefore, wish to oppose the bill. Yet I should not like to permit the bill to go through without expressing my opposition to this type of legislation.

There have been many abuses in connection with investment trusts, and I think there should be a regulation of such trusts. I believe that a simple control bill, by which they might be subjected to the same kind of investigation to which banks are subjected from time to time, and required to make an official statement, and the prohibition against three or four of the practices which are obviously in many cases already criminal, in which many of the less responsible trusts have engaged, would be sufficient.

I dislike very much the practice of giving infinite and all kinds of discretionary power to the Securities and Exchange Commission, power to tell a man how he shall conduct his business, what kind of directors he shall have, how his business generally shall be operated in detail.

Incidentally, the bill in effect is practically a provision for a Federal incorporation of investment trusts, because the provisions dealing with the kind of securities which may be issued, and the kind of corporate set-up an investment trust may have, are so detailed that, as a practical matter, we are saying to this kind of company exactly how it shall incorporate, what kind of stock it shall have, and what kind of stock it shall not have.

It seems to me the justification for the bill would extend also to a general Federal regulation, in fact, incorporation, of insurance companies, which are very much in the same position as investment trusts, although there have not been the same abuses which have occurred in that field.

For these reasons I do not like to let the bill go through without expressing my opposition to this general type of legislation. Yet I certainly admit the fact that the trusts should be regulated, and since the Investment Trust Association itself has agreed upon the bill, I do not desire to oppose it.

I may say that one of the great difficulties of the Congress in attempting to avoid the detailed regulation of business, with indefinite power in a Federal bureau, is the fact that in many cases the businessmen themselves seem to want that kind of regulation. It is so in this case, and so it has been in other cases. So it was in the case of the N. R. A. Much of the demand for that regulation came from businessmen themselves. Personally, I think in the end they will bitterly regret that they have agreed to that kind of regulation, but at the present time I do not wish to oppose the passage of this particular bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Let me inquire of the Senator whether, if the bill shall be enacted into law, it will oust the States of jurisdiction over investment trusts even though they confine their activities to the limits of their respective borders.

Mr. TAFT. My recollection is—and I speak with some hesitation because I have not studied the revised bill—that there is practically no distinction between interstate commerce and ordinary commerce, so far as the bill is concerned; that the bill rather assumes that the whole business is subject to Federal regulation, because much of it is interstate and therefore subject to control. Whether if an investment trust showed that its business was strictly intrastate it could escape the provisions of the law would probably be up to the courts. I think in this bill Congress is rather assuming that it has power over all investment trusts.

Mr. KING. I was interested in the observation made by the Senator that this may be a prelude, if I understood him correctly, to the Federal Government taking over insurance companies, or bringing them under the jurisdiction of some Federal agency. Does the Senator think this would be in the nature of a precedent to guide the courts or Congress in the determination of what kind of insurance companies we should have?

Mr. TAFT. I can see no difference whatever between the situation of the insurance companies and that of the investment trusts, with the exception that the investment trusts have been inadequately regulated by the States, being a new kind of institution. The States, in many cases, have not gotten around to regulating them, although in Ohio they are regulated by State control. There is also the fact that the insurance-company abuses occurred a great many years ago, and there have been no serious abuses lately, the companies having been well conducted, whereas in the investment-trust field, following the depressions of 1929, 1930, and 1932, there were many serious abuses, in many cases amounting to criminal action on the part of the investment trusts.

Mr. KING. The Senator is a member of the committee which reported the bill, is he not?

Mr. TAFT. Yes.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator whether there was any testimony before the committee in opposition to the bill, or critical of any of its provisions, so critical as to warrant amendment of the bill.

Mr. TAFT. There was much objection, but the objections were nearly all met by the bill as it was reported, so far as the ordinary investment trusts are concerned. I think I have received other objections, from companies which are not quite in the nature of investment trusts, which think they will be restricted by the bill. I have received letters and other communications. But we have had no hearing since the original hearing, and I do not believe those objections are important.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand the Senator, the bill is merely one in harmony with the present trend of political and governmental activities, namely, to concentrate additional authority and power in the hands of the Federal Government.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator is correct, in my opinion.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I merely wish to assure the Senator, in the first place, that of course we cannot deal with matters beyond the constitutional authority of Congress, and we do not attempt to do so. The bill deals with matters affecting interstate commerce or involving the use of the mails or instrumentalities of interstate commerce. Secondly, although there was opposition to the original bill, as introduced, virtually every witness representing any part of the industry who so testified subsequently gave testimony approving the legislation as now proposed.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the bill has nothing to do with the regulation of insurance companies.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course not.

Mr. BYRNES. The platforms of both political parties have urged supervision of insurance by the several States, but not regulation by the Federal Government.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I wish to say that there is some opposition to the bill on the part of certain companies. I realize that it would be useless to oppose it on the floor of the Senate, and that is not my purpose because investment trusts should be regulated. But the bill will have the effect of deterring the growth of the investment-trust business, and in many sections of the country, mine included, it will be a distinct detriment to small companies because of the limited incomes of such companies. I think it will be necessary with a year or within 6 months to amend the law, unless the Securities and Exchange Commission, as it claims it can do under its discretionary power, shall be willing to give the small investment-trust companies an opportunity to grow and meet the competition of the huge investment trust companies.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course, if any injustice is done, we will be alert to remove it. We do not know of any.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H. R. 10065) was read the third time and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 4108 will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WAGNER. I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD the report of the Banking and Currency Committee on Senate bill 4108; also a joint statement by the sponsors of the 20-day amendment.

There being no objection, the report and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INVESTMENT COMPANY ACT OF 1940 AND INVESTMENT ADVISERS ACT OF 1940

Mr. WAGNER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 4108):

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred a bill (S. 4108) to provide for the registration and regulation of investment companies and investment advisers and for other purposes, having considered the same, reports favorably thereon, and recommends that the bill do pass.

This bill is a substitute for S. 3580, introduced March 14, 1940. The original bill was the outgrowth of an extensive study and investigation of investment trusts and investment companies conducted by the Securities and Exchange Commission pursuant to the direction of the Congress. A subcommittee held hearings on the original bill extending over a period of approximately 4 weeks. At these hearings, while the immediate need for national legislation regulating investment companies was conceded by virtually every witness who testified, representatives of the companies affected expressed considerable opposition to some features of the bill. Many of these joined in submitting to the subcommittee, at the close of the hearings, concrete proposals to regulate investment trusts and investment companies.

Almost immediately after the conclusion of the hearings, representatives of the investment companies and of the Securities and Exchange Commission advised the chairman of the subcommittee that they believed it might be possible for them to reach a common ground and to submit a joint recommendation as to the scope and provisions of the bill. The chairman encouraged them in this endeavor, and as a result of their cooperative efforts, the substitute bill, S. 4108, was drafted.

The substitute bill represents the result of intensive effort for a period of some 5 weeks by representatives of the industry and of the Commission. Not merely the principles of this bill, but also its provisions as drafted, are strongly endorsed both by the Securities and Exchange Commission and by almost every company which appeared in opposition to the bill as originally drafted. In addition, the substitute bill is endorsed by a number of companies which did not appear either in opposition to or in support of the original bill. Thus the substitute bill, as introduced and reported, has the distinction of having the virtually unanimous support of the persons for whose regulation it provides, as well as of the regulatory agency by which it is to be administered. Representatives of the industry urged upon the committee that the present international situation should not only be a deterrent to the enactment of this legislation but should rather serve as a vital reason for its immediate passage. As was stated by the representative of a substantial portion of the investment company industry at the close of the hearing:

"* * * we feel that this bill is not only a workable bill, but is a bill which is a good thing for the industry. We would like very much to see it passed, and we hope very much that it can be passed at this session. The industry would like to feel that it has regulation behind it; that is, that we may know what the regulation is to be and that we will no longer live in uncertainty as to what the future holds for us. This is the type of regulation under which the industry feels it can work and which it feels will be very beneficial to the industry. We are hopeful that if this legislation passes it will constitute a stimulus to the investment company industry's contributing to venture capital.

"* * * the critical period that we are going through now, rather than being a reason for postponing legislation, is, in our opinion, an added reason for passing this legislation. We feel that it would be helpful not only to the industry to have this legislation passed now, * * * but also * * * we feel that it is a very healthy sign that Government and industry can come together and do a constructive job of this kind."

TITLE I. INVESTMENT TRUSTS AND INVESTMENT COMPANIES

GENERAL STATEMENT

Natures and types of investment trusts and investment companies: Investment trusts and investment companies are essentially institutions which provide a medium for public investment in common stocks and other securities. They may be divided into four broad classifications: (1) Management investment companies; (2) unit investment trusts, including the so-called fixed trusts; (3) periodic or installment payment plans; and (4) companies issuing face-amount certificates.

The distinctive feature of the management investment companies is that no restrictions, or only limited restrictions, are imposed with respect to the nature, type and amounts of investment which their managements may make. These companies fall into two broad classes—the open-end, and the closed-end type. The peculiarity of open-end companies is that they issue so-called redeemable securities—that is, a security which provides that the holder may tender it to the company at any time and receive a sum of money approximating the current market value of his proportionate interest in the company's assets. Because of the exercise of this redemption feature, the assets of most open-end companies would constantly be shrinking if they did not continuously sell new securities to investors. It is because of this constant redemption and sales activity that these companies are called open-end companies. Closed-end companies are management investment companies which do not have this redemption feature. They do not distribute their securities continuously but only from time to time as they need new capital. Up to 1929 nearly all investment companies were of the closed-end type. However, the open-end companies, though a relatively recent development, have expanded rapidly.

In the fixed or unit investment trusts, management discretion is completely or almost completely eliminated. The investor is sold an undivided interest in a specified package or unit of securities, which are deposited with a trustee. The underlying securities cannot be changed, or can be eliminated only upon the happening of certain specified contingencies, such as the passing of a dividend on any security in the package for a prescribed period of time, or the reduction in the investment rating of the security by a prescribed statistical service.

The so-called installment investment or periodic payment plan is in essence a device to sell investment trust or investment company shares to the public on the installment plan. These plans have been designed to tap the savings of individuals in the lowest economic and income strata of the population, for investment in common stocks. Some plans have provided for installments as low as $5 a month, but the usual payment is $10 a month and the period of payment is generally 10 years.

The so-called face-amount certificates are in essence contracts between the corporation which issues them and the purchaser, whereby in consideration of the payment of certain specified installments the corporation agrees to pay to the purchaser at maturity a definite sum, the "face amount" of the certificate; or to pay prior to maturity a specified surrender value of the certificate.

Public participation in investment trusts and companies: Investment companies have emerged as important financial institutions only within the last 20 years. The growth of the industry has been phenomenal, particularly since 1926. During the 1920's the type of investment company which was almost exclusively organized was the closed-end management investment company. So rapid was their organization during this period that by 1929 they were being created at the rate of almost one a day.

After the market crash of 1929, the substantial losses suffered by closed-end management investment companies acted as an impediment to the further distribution of their securities, and the rise of other types of companies was accelerated. The open-end management companies, which offered the investor the opportunity to redeem his stock or security at approximately its actual value if dissatisfied with the management of the company, and the unit investment trusts, which dispensed with management entirely, rapidly increased the sales of their securities after 1930. Although face-amount certificate companies have been in existence since 1894, the greater portion of their certificates have been sold since 1929. Finally, since 1930, periodic payment plans have attracted the savings of a large number of individuals in the lower income strata of the country's population.

The American public has invested altogether almost $7,000,000,000 in investment companies of all types. This sum may be compared with the $14,000,000,000 roughly estimated as the investment in the electric-light industry. The present assets of all investment companies have a value of approximately $4,000,000,000. Investors have suffered tremendous losses on their investment in such companies.

At present the securities of such companies are owned by approximately 2,000,000 investors throughout this country. The number of security holders of investment trusts and investment companies probably exceeds that of all other industries except utility holding company systems. It is estimated that 1 out of every 10 holders of securities of all types in this country is a holder of investment trust and investment company shares or certificates. Widely promoted as institutions for the small investor, the securities of investment companies evidently appealed mostly to that type of individual. The reports of the Securities and Exchange Commission indicate that approximately one-fourth of the common-stock holders in the large management investment companies hold 10 shares or less and well over half of all such common-stock holders hold 50 shares or less. Similarly, approximately half of the preferred-stock holders in such companies hold 10 shares or less, and about 95 percent hold 100 shares or less. Stated in terms of the market values of holdings of common-stock holders, approximately one-half of common-stock holders in management investment companies hold common shares with a market value of $500 or less. The certificates and shares of unit investment trusts, periodic payment plans and face-amount certificate companies are also held predominantly by small investors.

Relationship of investment companies to the national economy: Investment trusts and investment companies are vitally associated with the national economy. They conduct their business by the use of the mails and the channels of interstate and foreign commerce. In numerous cases they conduct a substantial portion of their business in States other than those in which they are incorporated or otherwise created. Their security holders are situated in every State and in several foreign countries. A large proportion of all corporate securities sold in this country are those of investment trusts and investment companies. For example, from 1927 to 1936, inclusive, the reports of the Securities and Exchange Commission indicate that these organizations sold approximately $6,500,000,000 of their securities to the public. These sales represented approximately 22 percent of all nonrefunding sales of corporate securities during the period. Furthermore, approximately one-half of all common-stock issues registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission under the Securities Act of 1933 are those of investment companies. From the effective date of the Securities Act up to the end of 1939, approximately $2,200,000,000 of common stocks of investment trusts and companies, as compared with a total of $4,000,000,000 of common-stock offerings of all types of companies, have been registered with the Commission. Investment companies are also substantial purchasers of securities listed on national securities exchanges, and their trading may have an important effect on the price movements of securities.

The Securities and Exchange Commission's studies indicate that management investment companies individually held directly or indirectly 1 percent or more of the voting stocks of 200 noninvestment companies having total assets and resources of perhaps $30,000,000,000. The enterprises subject to the control and influence of investment companies include banks, insurance and mortgage financing companies, aviation and steamship companies, oil-producing and refining companies, chemical companies, motion-picture producing and exhibiting companies, steel and rubber companies, food and food-products companies, manufacturing companies of all types, department stores and other merchandising companies engaged in sales of their wares by mail order and the channels of interstate commerce.

Finally, a most significant function of investment companies in relation to the immediate needs of the national economy is their potential usefulness in the supply of new capital to industry, particularly to small and promotional ventures. Although in the past investment companies have furnished but comparatively little capital to industry, it is the hope of the committee, as well as of the investment company industry and of the Securities and Exchange Commission, that regulation of investment companies, as provided for in this bill, may stimulate venture capital and the financing of industry.

Study of investment companies by the Securities and Exchange Commission: The study of investment trusts and investment companies by the Securities and Exchange Commission, to which reference has previously been made, furnishes much of the background and data for this bill. The study was conducted pursuant to the authorization and direction of the Congress contained in section 30 of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935.

Most of the basic data of the study was obtained from answers to questionnaires prepared by the Commission after consultations with committees of the industry. By the end of 1937 the Commission had received replies from about 700 trusts and companies of all types and from about 400 investment advisers. In addition, field studies were made of many companies. After the examinations in the field and study of the questionnaires, the Commission prepared a detailed preliminary report on each company. Each report was submitted to the company concerned for criticism and comment.

Public examinations were held on 250 companies, practically every company which had $10,000,000 or more of assets. In these public hearings the companies examined were entitled to be represented by counsel to cross-examine witnesses produced by the Commission, and to present evidence through witnesses of their own choosing. The record of these public examinations consist of 33,000 pages of testimony and 4,800 exhibits.

Based on the data thus obtained, the Commission's reports were prepared and from time to time, as they were completed, were transmitted to the Congress. The scope and subject matter of these reports are as follows:

Part 1 of the Commission's over-all report, entitled "The Nature, Classification, and Origins of Investment Trusts and Investment Companies" (H. Doc. No. 707, 75th Cong.), deals with the scope, magnitude, and conduct of the Commission's study; the nature and classification of investment companies and the origins of the investment company movement in this country.

Part 2 of the report, entitled "Statistical Survey of Investment Trusts and Investment Companies" (H. Doc. No. 70, 76th Cong.), is a detailed statistical study of the growth of the total assets of investment companies; sales and repurchases of the securities of such companies; trading in their securities; the ownership and control of such companies; the performance of large management investment companies; the investor's experience in such companies and the portfolio investments made by such companies.

Part 3 of the Commission's report, entitled "Abuses and Deficiencies in the Organization and Operation of Investment Trusts and Investment Companies" (H. Doc. No. 279, 76th Cong.), deals with the background of the industry in relation to abuses and contains detailed histories of various investment trusts and investment companies. In addition this part of the report deals with problems in connection with: (1) The sales and repurchases of the securities of investment companies; (2) shifts in control, mergers, and consolidations of investment companies; (3) capital structures of investment companies; (4) accounting practices and reports to stockholders of investment companies; and (5) the management of the assets of such companies.

In addition to its over-all report, the Commission has submitted to the Congress six supplemental reports dealing, respectively, with Fixed and Semifixed Trusts (H. Doc. No. 567, 76th Cong.), Companies Sponsoring Installment Investment Plans (H. Doc. No. 482, 76th Cong.), Commingled or Common Trust Funds Administered by Banks and Trust Companies (H. Doc. No. 380, 76th Cong.), Investment Counsel, Investment Management, Investment Supervisory, Investment Advisory Services (H. Doc. No. 477, 76th Cong.), Investment Trusts in Great Britain (H. Doc. No. 380, 76th Cong.), and Companies Issuing Face-Amount Certificates (H. Doc. No. 659, 76th Cong.).

Problems in connection with the investment company industry: The record of the study of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the testimony taken before the subcommittee show there are various problems with respect to the organization and operation of investment companies which should be remedied by legislation. That this is so is recognized by representatives of the industry. The more important of these problems will be briefly summarized.

Basically the problems flow from the very nature of the assets of investment companies. The assets of such companies invariably consist of cash and securities, assets which are completely liquid, mobile, and readily negotiable. Because of these characteristics, control of such funds offers manifold opportunities for exploitation by the unscrupulous managements of some companies. These assets can and have been easily misappropriated and diverted by such types of managements and have been employed to foster their personal interests rather than the interests of public security holders. It is obvious that in the absence of regulatory legislation, individuals who lack integrity will continue to be attracted by the opportunities for personal profit available in the control of the liquid assets of investment companies and that deficiencies which have occurred in the past will continue to occur in the future.

The wide appeal to the public which has been made by investment companies in the past has been indicated in the testimony before the committee. It is evident that companies honestly and efficiently managed can serve a most useful purpose in extending to the public an opportunity to participate financially in the economic enterprise of the country. The committee believes that this bill will provide safeguards without undue restriction, so that those who desire to put their savings to work in this manner may do so with greater confidence.

Since no specified amount of capital is required to organize investment trusts and companies, they can be and have been created and their securities have been sold to the public in many instances by irresponsible individuals. Persons convicted or enjoined by courts because of perpetration of securities frauds are able, nevertheless, to organize and operate investment companies. Brokers, security dealers, investment bankers, and commercial banks are in a position to dominate the board of directors and control the management of investment companies; and thus, when they are unscrupulous, to advance their own pecuniary interests at the expense of the investment companies and their security holders.

MANAGEMENT INVESTMENT COMPANIES

The capital structures of management investment companies have often been inordinately complex, and the rights, preferences, and dividend claims of senior securities have in many instances been inadequately safeguarded. By various devices of control, such as special voting stocks issued to distributors and managements, voting trusts, long-term management contracts, control of the proxy machinery, and pyramiding of companies, public investors are effectively denied, in many instances, any real participation in the management of their companies.

The distribution and repurchase of the securities issued by investment companies have on occasion resulted in discrimination in favor of the management or other "insiders" who have been able to acquire the securities and to have the companies repurchase them on a basis more favorable than that accorded public stockholders. In the open-end companies the method of pricing their securities, which they are continuously selling and redeeming, may lead at times to substantial dilution of the investors' equity in the companies, and in some instances has even been used by persons closely connected with the companies to realize riskless trading profits.

A major problem in the case of management companies is created by the absence of any legal requirement for adherence to any announced investment policies or purposes. Such policies have often been radically changed without the knowledge or prior consent of stockholders. Similarly, after investors have invested in companies on their faith in the reputation and standing of the existing managements, control of the public's funds has frequently been transferred without the prior knowledge or consent of stockholders to other persons who were subsequently guilty of gross mismanagement of the companies.

The representatives of the investment-trust industry were of the unanimous opinion that "self-dealing"—that is, transactions between officers, directors, and similar persons and the investment companies with which they are associated—presented opportunities for gross abuse by unscrupulous persons, through unloading of securities upon the companies, unfair purchases from the companies, the obtaining of unsecured or inadequately secured loans from the companies, etc. The industry recognized that even for the most conscientious managements, transactions between these affiliated persons and the investment companies present many difficulties. Many investment companies have voluntarily barred this type of transaction.

The small investors in certain investment companies, particularly in unit investment trusts and open-end management companies, have been subjected to switching operations from one investment company to another to their pecuniary damage. Similarly, investors have been often powerless to protect themselves against plans of reorganization which have been grossly unfair or have constituted gross abuses of trust on the part of their sponsors.

Finally, particularly with respect to those companies which have not registered their securities under the Securities Act of 1933 or the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, and only a small number has so registered its securities, the investor has been unable to obtain adequate information as to their operations. The accounting practices and financial reports to stockholders of management investment companies frequently are deficient and inadequate in many respects and ofttimes are misleading. In many cases, dividends have been declared and paid without informing the stockholders that such dividends represented not earnings but a return of capital to stockholders.

UNIT INVESTMENT TRUSTS

Certain abuses and deficiencies characterized particularly the unit investment or fixed trusts. These abuses are traceable to the fact that the most important emolument to the promoters of such trusts were the profits to be derived by the methods of pricing and selling the certificates of such trusts to the public. Inequitable pricing of shares, excessive sales loads, hidden loads, and charges have not been infrequent.

Furthermore, riskless trading profits and improper dilution of the investors' equity have not been unusual. The fixed-trust shareholder was particularly subject to switching operations. Each of these switches invariably included additional loading charges exacted from the investor. Usually the trustee of the underlying assets of trusts would also cease its active connection with the trust, frequently because the rate of compensation was insufficient to sustain its interest in the trust. The result is that no responsible party is connected with the trust with whom the investor can deal. Certificate holders are thus left without any method of realizing on their certificates and the trusts become "orphans."

PERIODIC PAYMENT PLANS

Early in 1930 a somewhat novel variety of investment scheme, called variously "installment-investment plan," "periodic-payment plan," "thrift plan," "foundation plan," etc., was conceived. These periodic-payment plans are in essence devices for selling investment trust or investment company securities on a periodic or installment-plan basis. These periodic-payment plans should be distinguished from programs sponsored by savings banks, building and loan associations, insurance companies, etc. The holder of a periodic payment-plan certificate is not entitled to be repaid a fixed sum of money or a fixed amount of income, but is entitled to receive only the asset value of his certificate. This asset value is in essence based upon the market value of the securities in the portfolio of the investment company or investment trust underlying the installment investment certificate. The amount to which the certificate holder is entitled may be less than, equal to, or more than the amount paid by the certificate holder, depending upon market prices of these portfolio securities which almost invariably consisted of common stocks. The purchaser of a periodic payment plan certificate is, therefore, speculating or investing in the stock market.

The structure of the periodic-payment plan in most instances, but not in every instance, was that of a "trust on a trust" whereby two sets of sales loads were imposed upon the investors, usually without their knowledge.

The plans which were most widely sold to the public had sales loads ranging from 17 percent to 20 percent. The Securities and Exchange Commission, in its report to the Congress on periodic-payment plans, stated that the total loading charges, including trustees' fees and secondary loading charges, were more than 30 percent of the net amount invested by certificate holders during the period studied. A serious problem is presented by the fact that these substantial sales loads have been usually deducted entirely from the payments made in the early months of the periodic payment plan contract. As a consequence, only a very small part of the purchaser's early payments were invested for his account. An investor withdrawing in the first year of the plan almost inevitably received substantially less than the amount he had paid on his certificate. During the first 6 months of most plans a withdrawing certificate holder sustained practically a total loss. At the end of the year, this loss was well over 50 percent in many plans. Lapses of certificates in the early period of the contract have been frequent. In fact, the Securities and Exchange Commission reported to the Congress that well over 85 percent of the payments made by certificate holders of periodic-payment plans was lost to them because of lapses during the first year. Approximately 40 percent of the total amount payable on periodic payment plan certificates sold in the period 1930–35 was lapsed at the end of 1935. The holders of periodic payment plan certificates were subject to a variety of switching operations resulting in profits to the sponsor and a loss to the investor by the exaction of another secondary sales load on the switches.

These periodic payment plan certificates, which were sold for as low as $5 a month, were specifically designed to make their strongest appeal to wage-earning men and women who were not in a financial position to invest or speculate in common stocks. As a result, these certificates were sold to housewives, domestic workers, laborers, nurses, stenographers, clerks, and others who had little financial experience. Inasmuch as the refinement and technique of the operation of periodic-payment plans are intricate, they were far beyond the comprehension of the class of persons to whom these certificates were sold.

In addition to the fact that persons unqualified to understand the intricacies of the plan were employed as salesmen, the committee was impressed by the evidence that salesmen often flagrantly misrepresented these plans. Fees were minimized or not disclosed. Undue emphasis was placed on the trustee and trusteeships. The trustee, whose functions were usually confined to holding title and custody of the underlying securities for the benefit of the certificate holder, was usually a large financial institution. Salesmen would show the balance sheets of these banks to prospects who would be advised that the trustee was back of and sponsored the plan. Thus, subscribers to these plans were apparently under the misapprehension that these large financial institutions actually guaranteed the so-called maturity value. Actually the trustee is in no way responsible for the operation of the plan. Further supposed similarities between the plans and savings accounts and insurance and endowment policies were indicated. A maturity value or termination value which did not represent an obligation was placed on the installment-plan certificate. Withdrawal and borrowing privileges were enlarged upon as salesmen analogized the periodic-payment plans to savings bonds. Glowing predictions of wealth and financial independence were made. Emphasis was placed upon the great corporations, the common stock of which underlaid the installment plan. Not only was there a tendency to confuse the soundness of the great corporations with the soundness of the periodic-payment plan, but many certificate holders were mislead into believing that their money was directly invested in these securities rather than in interposed investment trust shares. Emphasis on the savings, in the periodic payment plan literature was made in an effort to meet the sales resistance of a prospective purchaser to a speculative incursion into the investment field.

COMPANIES ISSUING FACE-AMOUNT INSTALLMENT CERTIFICATES

Face-amount installment certificates are, in essence, unsecured obligations to pay a specified amount to the holder at a specified future date provided the purchaser makes all the payments required by these contracts. The contracts after a certain number of prescribed payments have a cash surrender value—the holder of the contract is entitled to receive prior to maturity a specified amount if he surrenders his certificate to the issuing company.

The face amounts of these certificates are usually $2,500 or less with payments in installments over a period of 10 or 15 years, varying according to series. A typical certificate issued by these companies has a face amount of $2,500 and requires payments in installments over a period of 15 years of $1,800 or $120 per year. The strength of the appeal of these certificates to investors is indicated by the fact that at the end of 1936 such investors had contracted to invest some $700,000,000 in these companies and had already paid in about $100,000,000 on this obligation.

Many instances have been disclosed where this type of security has been sold on the basis of the comparison with savings-bank deposits and insurance policies. Although savings banks and insurance companies are subject to strict regulation as to assets and reserves, the face-amount certificate companies have operated without any such uniform type of regulation with the result that, in some cases, assets have been carried at highly fictitious values, and, in other cases, inadequate reserves have been maintained for the fixed obligations.

The Commission's study has indicated that in certain cases obligations of face-amount companies with high improvement rates have been met despite changed conditions with lower prevailing interest returns on investments, through a combination of several factors. The lapse experience of investors was high, particularly during the first and second years when the investor had no surrender value or a surrender value substantially less than the total of the amount he had paid (although the certificates issued by some of the face-amount companies provided for reinstatement with credit for the amount paid in). The so-called stretch-out practice of depriving the investor pursuant to contract of any interest return on his entire investment during any period in which he has been in default, lowered the improvement rate so far as the company was concerned.

Furthermore, surrender values only accrued as of anniversary dates of the certificates, which was yearly. Monthly payments less than a year and interest on the last attained surrender value would not increase the surrender value above the preceding anniversary date. Payments made and interest on the entire investment between anniversary dates therefore might be sacrificed under the terms of the contract in the event of any surrender between such dates.

As a result of the various types of regulatory provisions in the many States in which face-amount companies operate, there is presently no uniform actuarial reserve system required by law.

Another serious aspect of this type of investment company relates to the problems of the investors in these certificates in the event of the bankruptcy of such a company. Not all of these companies are at present required to deposit qualified assets with any custodian for the benefit of all their certificate holders. Some State authorities do require such deposits for the protection of certificate holders residing in the particular States, and even such requirements are not on a uniform basis. In the event of bankruptcy a situation might be created where inequality of treatment might exist for certificate holders of the various States. Furthermore, the problems arising cut of bankruptcy would be accentuated by the fact that the assets of these companies are located in almost every State in this country.

NECESSITY FOR LEGISLATION

The committee has been greatly impressed with the sincerity and public-spirited attitude evinced by the representatives of the industry in participating in the formulation of this legislation. The committee, in recommending this regulatory legislation, does not mean to imply that most investment trusts and investment companies at present operating in this country were guilty of unfair practices or were mismanaged. Nor does it mean to indicate that in the last decade progress has not been made by the members of the industry voluntarily to eliminate some of the major abuses and deficiencies, and to improve generally standards of practice in the light of experience. However, the record does indicate that some of the grossest abuses were perpetrated in most recent years, in fact, during the very course of the Commission's study. The conclusion is clear that the perpetrations of these misfeasances and the recurrence of these abuses cannot be completely abated nor the deficiencies eliminated without the enactment of adequate Federal legislation regulating these institutions. Virtually every representative of investment companies who appeared before the subcommittee conceded the necessity for, and in fact urged the immediate passage of, effective legislation to regulate investment companies. Practically no dissenting voice has been raised against any of the provisions of the substitute bill. In fact, this bill has received the affirmative and unequivocal approval of the industry as a whole.

The Securities Act of 1933 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 have been ineffective to correct abuses and deficiencies in investment companies: First, because the record before the committee is clear that publicity alone, which in general is the remedy provided by these acts, is insufficient to eliminate the abuses and deficiencies which exist in investment companies; and, second, because a large number of such companies have never come under the purview of these acts. The representatives of the industry recognized that the protection of investors against unscrupulous management and the necessity for the prevention of the recurrence of the abuses disclosed by the Commission's study and the committee hearings made indispensable the immediate enactment of adequate legislation regulating investment companies. This is also the opinion of the committee, and the Securities and Exchange Commission concurs. Representatives of the industry have stated for the committee's record that they definitely feel that this bill (S. 4108) will materially abate, if not virtually eliminate, the malpractices and deficiencies in these organizations. They have urged that this legislation will serve the most salutary purpose of protecting small investors from breaches of trust; will afford investors a regulated and supervised institution in which to invest their savings; will act as an incentive for venture and risk capital; and will supply an intelligent and articulate group of stockholders in industrial and other public corporations. The industry asserted, and the Commission and the committee believe, that this legislation will tend to prevent those abuses which have been a stigma upon and impaired the usefulness of the investment trust industry as a whole.

Representatives of the Securities and Exchange Commission and of the industry who appeared at the hearings called the attention of the committee to the serious tax problem affecting investment companies. It appears that the nature of these companies in many respects, constituting a conduit for distribution of income to the smaller investor, is such that they should not be subjected to the same type of taxation as the ordinary business corporation. This has already been recognized in respect of certain classes of open-end companies which receive special tax treatment under existing Federal tax laws. The record before the committee indicates that the tax problem is acute with respect to closed-end companies of the type classified in this bill as "diversified." If this bill is passed, the committee believes that the tax problem of these companies should receive prompt consideration.

ANALYSIS OF PROVISIONS OF TITLE I

Findings and declaration of policy: Section 1 of the bill contains the findings of the Congress with respect to investment companies and the declaration of policy of the bill.

Definitions and exemptions of investment companies: Investment companies within the purview of this bill are in general defined as companies which are engaged primarily in the business of investing, reinvesting, and trading in securities; and issuers which invest in or hold securities (other than securities of noninvestment company subsidiaries) having a value exceeding 40 percent of the value of their total assets. A third group of investment companies covered by the bill are companies which engage in the business of issuing so-called face-amount installment certificates. Provision is made generally to exclude from the bill companies primarily engaged, directly or through subsidiaries, in the operation of a business other than that of an investment company. In addition the bill specifically excludes brokers, underwriters, banks, insurance companies, common or commingled trust funds administered by a bank, bank holding company affiliates subject to the supervision of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, companies subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and those of their wholly owned subsidiaries substantially all of whose assets consist of securities of companies which themselves are subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, small loan companies, factoring companies, companies dealing in mortgages or discount paper, holding companies subject to the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, and certain other special types of companies (sec. 3). The bill makes provision for the exempting of employees' investment companies and certain other persons who are not within the intent of the proposed legislation (sec. 6).

Classification and subclassification of investment companies: Investment companies are broadly classified into three categories: management companies, unit investment trusts, and face-amount certificate companies. Management companies are divided into two types: open-end companies—companies in which the stockholder or certificate holder has a right to compel the company to redeem his shares at their asset value; and closed-end companies—companies in which the shareholders do not have such a right. Management companies, both of the open-end and closed-end type, are further subclassified upon the basis of the extent of the diversification of their investments, into diversified companies which, speaking generally, must have at least 75 percent of their assets in diversified securities and nondiversified companies which are not required so to diversify their investments (secs. 4 and 5).

Transactions by unregistered investment companies: Investment companies, unless registered as provided in the bill, are forbidden to conduct their activities through use of the mails or instrumentalities of interstate commerce. Foreign investment companies may not register as investment companies or publicly offer securities of which they are the issuer in the United States unless the Commission finds that these foreign investment companies can be effectively subjected to the same type of regulation as domestic investment companies (sec. 7).

Registration of, disclosure of investment policy, and size of investment companies: Provision is made for the registration of investment companies with the Commission. In the main, the Commission may require the information required to register securities under the Securities Act of 1933 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. In addition, the registration statement must state the policy of the company as to items specifically enumerated in the bill and supply information with respect to the business affiliation and experience of the officers and directors of the company. Provision is made for the simplification of the registration procedure by permitting the filing of copies of registration statements already filed under the acts now administered by the Commission. No shift in the company's fundamental policies as stated in the registration statement may be made without the approval of a majority of the company's outstanding voting securities (secs. 8 and 13).

To put a brake on the irresponsible formation of investment companies, no investment company organized hereafter may make a public offering of its securities unless it has or is assured of having at least $100,000 through private subscription. The bill does not contain any limitation with respect to maximum size of investment companies, but authorizes the Commission to study and report from time to time the effect of size of investment companies both on the national economy and on the trusts themselves (sec. 14).

Ineligibility of certain affiliated persons and underwriters: Any person who within 10 years has been convicted of a crime or is enjoined by a court in connection with a security or financial fraud is prohibited by the bill from acting as an officer or director of any investment company or in certain other capacities. The bill recognizes, however, that even such a person may rehabilitate himself, and so the Commission is authorized to exempt persons from this prohibition where it is shown that the penalty as applied to any such person would be unduly or disproportionately severe or that the conduct of such person has been such as not to make it against the public interest or protection of investors that such exception be granted (sec. 9).

Provisions relating to directors, officers, and certain affiliated persons: In the future no person shall serve as a director of an investment company unless elected by the holders of its outstanding voting securities, except that, in effect, vacancies not exceeding one-third of the board occurring between meetings of stockholders may be filled in any otherwise legal manner. However, with respect to existing strict trusts, where no provision is made for election of trustees, the bill does not require an affirmative election of trustees but provides a procedure for their removal by certificate holders (sec. 16).

The bill provides that at least 40 percent of the board of directors of an investment company shall be independent; that is, no more than 60 percent may consist of investment advisers to the company or affiliated persons of such an adviser or officers or employees of the company. Moreover, a majority of the board of directors of an investment company must be composed of persons who are not regular brokers for the company or principal underwriters of its securities, or investment bankers, or in each case persons affiliated with them. An exception is made to take care of certain types of investment companies which are closely affiliated with investment advisers and which are designed primarily to make available this medium of diversification of investment to the smaller customers of these advisers. This exception is carefully safeguarded by specific conditions. Hereafter the majority of the board of directors of an investment company may not consist of persons who are officers or directors of any one bank, except that any investment company which, on March 15, 1940, shall have had a majority of its directors consisting of such persons may continue to do so (sec. 10).

In the future, persons who are officers, directors, investment advisers, etc., or persons affiliated with such persons may not, as principal, knowingly sell to or purchase from any investment company any securities or other property or borrow from any such investment company. Provision is made for certain exceptions with respect to transactions involving the company's own security issues and for transactions exempted by the Commission (sec. 17).

In general, agency transactions are not affected by the bill, but brokerage commissions are limited in the main to standard rates with provision for special exemptions. Provision is made that those officers and employees who have access to securities or funds of investment companies may be required to be bonded. Securities of investment companies must be placed in the custody either of banks, or with stock exchange firms subject to supervision by the Commission as to methods of safekeeping (sec. 17).

Investment companies may not purchase securities underwritten by persons affiliated with the investment company, unless the investment company itself is a principal underwriter of such securities, until after the termination of the underwriting syndicate (sec. 10). Officers and directors of investment companies and certain other persons are not allowed to exculpate themselves from liability for any willful misfeasance, bad faith, gross negligence, or reckless disregard of their duties (sec. 17). The provisions of section 16 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 relating to transactions of officers, directors, and controlling persons which now apply to equity securities of investment companies whose securities are listed on a national securities exchange are made applicable to all securities of all registered closed-end companies (sec. 30). Gross misconduct or gross abuse of trust by directors, officers, investment advisers, principal underwriters, etc., is made a basis for injunctive proceedings in a Federal court to be instituted by the Commission (sec. 36). Larceny or embezzlement of property of investment companies is made a Federal crime (sec. 37).

Provisions with respect to certain activities of investment companies: Investment companies, generally speaking, may not trade on margin, participate in joint trading accounts, or effect short sales in portfolio securities in contravention of rules and regulations which may be prescribed. Investment companies may engage in underwriting activities if consistent with their declared investment policies (sec. 12). Upstream loans to investment companies, except by wholly owned subsidiaries, are prohibited (sec. 21).

Hereafter, an investment company or group of controlled companies may not purchase securities issued by another investment company if as a result of such acquisition such group will have more than 3 percent of the outstanding voting securities of such other investment company, or 5 percent of a specialized investment company. Investment companies, however, may increase their holdings in other investment companies of which they already hold 25 percent of the voting stock, since such holdings constitute presumptive control. A similar provision limits the acquisition by investment companies of an insurance company's stock to 10 percent, with additional exceptions relating to the organization of new insurance companies and the purchase of stock of insurance companies from other investment companies or where it is found that such acquisition is in the public interest because the financial condition of such insurance company will be improved as a result of such acquisition or any plan contemplated as a result thereof (sec. 12).

Cross and circular ownership as defined are prohibited in the future and existing cross and circular ownership must be eliminated within 5 years (sec. 20).

Although investment companies are in general prohibited from acquiring securities of persons engaged in the brokerage business or in the business of underwriting and dealing in securities, provision is made to permit investment companies, either alone or jointly with other investment companies, to purchase stock of a company engaged primarily in the business of underwriting and distributing securities and to acquire stock of a company formed to engage in the business of furnishing new capital to industry, financing promotional enterprises and similar activities (sec. 12). It is hoped that investment companies will soon jointly form such a company. It is believed it should make a material contribution to national recovery.

Distribution, repurchases, and redemptions of investment company securities: No open-end company and no closed-end company may issue any of its securities except for cash or for securities (secs. 22 and 23).

Publicly offered securities of all investment companies must be registered under the Securities Act of 1933, but provision is made to eliminate duplication in the material filed under that act and the present bill. Circular literature intended for distribution to prospective purchasers of the securities of open-end companies, unit-investment trusts, and face-amount certificate companies must be filed with the Commission (sec. 24).

Closed-end companies may not issue their common stock at a price below the current net asset value, except in connection with an offering to their security holders, conversion of a convertible security, exercise of any warrant outstanding on the date of enactment of this bill, or with consent of a majority of their stockholders. No closed-end company may repurchase any of its outstanding securities except on a securities exchange or open market upon prescribed notice to its stockholders or pursuant to tenders or under other circumstances to be prescribed to insure fair treatment of all security holders (sec. 23).

With respect to the distribution and redemption of securities issued by open-end companies, an association of securities dealers registered under section 15A of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 is, subject to the provisions of that section, empowered to make rules to protect investors, so far as is reasonably practicable, against any dilution of their equity due to the methods of pricing, distribution, and redemption of redeemable securities and to prevent grossly excessive sales loads on such securities. The Commission, after 1 year, is empowered to make rules and regulations to deal with these subjects. In other words, the industry is given a year in which to solve this problem for itself. In addition, provision is made to prohibit the sale of redeemable securities to any person other than a dealer or principal underwriter at a price less than that at which the security is sold to the public. The bill prohibits the suspension of redemption of a redeemable security for a period more than 7 days except during certain specified emergency periods or other period fixed by the Commission. The negotiability of open-end securities may not be restricted in contravention of provisions which may be formulated (sec. 22).

Capital structure: Except for refunding of outstanding securities and securities issued in connection with reorganizations, closed-end companies in the future may not issue more than three classes of securities—one class of security representing indebtedness (including loans not publicly distributed), one class of preferred stock and one class of common stock. Securities representing indebtedness must have at the time of issue an asset coverage of at least 300 percent and preferred stock an asset coverage of at least 200 percent. Similarly no dividends or distributions may be declared or made upon the common stock unless the securities representing indebtedness and preferred stock issued in the future have an asset coverage of 300 percent and 200 percent, respectively, and dividends may not be paid on such preferred stock unless such indebtedness has an asset coverage of at least 200 percent. Voting rights are also provided for preferred stock and in certain contingencies for senior securities representing indebtedness other than loans. Temporary borrowings up to 5 percent are exempted from this provision (sec. 18).

Open-end investment companies are not permitted to issue any senior securities, except that such companies are permitted bank borrowings provided that an asset coverage of 300 percent is maintained at all times for such borrowings (sec. 18).

Dividends: In respect of dividends on existing securities, as well as securities issued in the future, investment companies are required to disclose by written statement accompanying any dividend the source of such payment when made other than from the current or accumulated net income as defined (sec. 19).

Proxies and voting trusts: Solicitations of proxies, consents, and authorizations relating to securities of investment companies registered under this bill are to be subject to the regulations to which solicitations relating to securities listed on national securities exchanges are already subject by reason of the Commission's regulations adopted under section 14 (a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. To assure uniformity of interpretation and administration as between that act and the present bill, section 20 (a) of the bill has been so drafted as to follow verbatim section 14 (a) of the Securities Exchange Act, with only such slight modifications of langauge as are necessary because of the special classes of companies to which section 20 (a) applies.

Hereafter, no public offering may be made of voting trust certificates of investment companies. Existing voting trusts may continue until their expiration (sec. 20).

Investment advisory contracts and contracts for distribution of open-end company securities: After 1 year from the effective date of the act all investment advisory or management contracts must be in writing, must prescribe in detail the compensation to be paid, and must be nonassignable and terminable upon 60 days' notice. In effect, the contract has to be approved by a majority of the voting stock, may be for an initial period of 2 years, and renewable annually thereafter by the board of directors or stockholders. Analogous provisions are incorporated with respect to contracts for the distribution of open-end company securities. Existing arrangements are permitted to continue for a period not exceeding 5 years (sec. 15).

Reorganizations of investment companies: With respect to investment company reorganizations as defined, the bill provides that the Commission, at the request of 25 percent of any class of the security holders to be affected by such reorganization, or on the request of a company which is a party to such a plan, may give an advisory opinion. The company is required to send a copy of such advisory opinion to its security holders. The Commission may institute injunction proceedings in a Federal Court to restrain the consummation of grossly unfair plans of reorganization or plans which constitute gross misconduct or gross abuse of trust (sec. 25). The functions and duties of the Securities and Exchange Commission under the Bankruptcy Act remain unchanged.

Reports and accounting: Investment companies are required to file with the Commission annual reports, including financial statements, similar to the annual reports now filed with the Commission under the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 by companies having securities listed on national securities exchanges, and less comprehensive reports on the semiannual or quarterly basis. In addition, investment companies must file with the Commission copies of reports sent to their security holders and may be required to transmit semiannually to their stockholders reports containing certain specified financial and other information. The reports to stockholders may not be misleading in any material respect in the light of the reports filed with the Commission. Under other acts administered by the Commission, lacking such a provision as this, misleading financial statements, inconsistent with those filed with the Commission, have been sent security holders in an appreciable number of instances. Annual reports to the Commission and to stockholders may be required to be certified by independent public accountants, whose certificate must be based on a reasonably comprehensive audit (sec. 30).

The Commission is authorized to require investment companies and certain of their majority-owned subsidiaries to preserve accounts, records, and documents upon which the financial statements filed with the Commission are predicated. Investment advisers, depositors, and principal underwriters of certain investment companies may likewise be required to preserve records showing their transactions with the investment companies with which they are associated. These accounts, records, and documents are subject at all times to examination by the Commission or its representatives. The Commission is authorized to provide for a reasonable degree of uniformity in the accounting policies and principles to be followed by investment companies in maintaining their accounts and records and preparing the financial statements required in their reports to the Commission and stockholders (sec. 31).

Subject to certain exceptions, the selection of independent public accountants of investment companies must be submitted for ratification or rejection to stockholders who, in addition, at any time by a majority vote may terminate their employment. The auditor's certificate must be addressed to security holders as well as the directors. The controller or other principal accounting officer of every company is to be chosen either by the board of directors of the company or by its security holders, and not merely be appointed by its executive officers. The Commission is also empowered to require accountants and auditors to keep reports and work sheets and other documents relating to investment companies (sec. 32).

Unit investment trusts: The trust indentures of unit investment trusts must designate as trustee or custodian a bank of a specified minimum size; must require that all property and funds of the trust will be held by the trustee; and that the trustee (which may not resign unless a successor trustee has been designated or the trust liquidated) be entitled to reimburse itself out of the trust property for its expenses actually incurred and fees actually earned. Except under special circumstances, the depositor or underwriter must be prohibited from deriving any fees from the trust other than the original sales load for distributing the shares. Provision must also be made to advise shareholders of portfolio changes. Finally, proceedings in court may be instituted by the Commission to liquidate so-called orphan trusts (sec. 26).

Periodic-payment plans: The bill contains additional provisions which relate specifically to companies issuing periodic payment plan certificates. These provisions fall roughly into three classes: Provisions relative to sales load; provisions regulating the incidents and denominations of the certificates, and provisions regarding custodianship. The sales load is limited to 9 percent. Recognizing the heavier initial expense, due primarily to sales commissions, the bill permits half of the sales load to be taken out during the first year of the plan; the balance is to be spread equally over the subsequent years. To prevent evasion of these restrictions on sales load by the imposition of so-called management fees, the Commission is authorized to prescribe maximum management fees. The provision relating to sales load may be modified by the Commission to meet the problems of small companies. Periodic payment plan certificates must be redeemable securities; and the initial payment under any plan must be at least $20, with each subsequent payment at least $10 (sec. 27).

Face-amount certificate companies: Companies which sell face-amount certificates are generally subject to the provisions of the bill but must comply with certain provisions which are specifically applicable to that type of company. The bill contains provisions with respect to minimum capitalization of face-amount certificate companies. All companies which in the future sell these certificates must at all times maintain reserves, which, accumulated at a rate not to exceed 3½ percent compounded annually, must provide an amount sufficient to meet at all times all the liabilities and obligations of the company to all its certificate holders. The companies must have cash or qualified investments (investments which are qualified under the Code for the District of Columbia for life insurance companies) of a value not less than the aggregate of their capital and reserve requirements. The bill makes provision to require deposit with certain qualified banks all or any part of the investments maintained by such company as certificate reserve requirements except that the company may be credited with deposits made pursuant to law or regulation with State authorities in respect to liabilities of the certificates sold to the residents of such States. The bill makes provision for the distribution of the loading charge (the maximum amount of which charge is fixed by the bill) over the life of the certificate. In essence, no more than 50 percent of the load may be taken out the first year, no more than 7 percent in each of the following 4 years, and not more than 4 percent the remaining years. The surrender value of the certificate for the first year must be equal to at least 50 percent of the gross annual payment made on the certificate and for any subsequent time must be the amount of reserve of such certificate less a prescribed surrender charge. A certificate may not contain a provision making the holder liable for any unpaid balance on the certificate and must provide for the issuance to the certificate holder upon the happening of certain contingencies of a so-called paid-up certificate.

The obligations of the company to a certificate holder, who has defaulted, are specifically enumerated in the bill (sec. 28). If a face-amount company does not maintain the minimum certificate reserve on all its outstanding face-amount certificates issued prior to the effective date of the bill then the company cannot make any distribution or pay any dividend on any senior capital security which exceeds a prescribed percentage of its earnings or which the Commission determines might impair the financial integrity of the company or its ability to meet its liabilities on the outstanding certificates. In the future, face amount certificate companies cannot issue senior capital securities in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors, or if such company has such senior capital securities outstanding to make any distribution or pay any dividend in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe to insure the financial integrity of the company and to prevent the impairment of the company's abilities to meet its obligations on its face-amount certificates (sec. 18). A face-amount company can acquire the securities of another face-amount company only upon certain prescribed conditions (sec. 12). The bill makes provision to obtain equality of treatment of certificate holders who are residents of various States in the event of bankruptcy of a face-amount company. The bill preserves the rights of residents in those States which require specific deposits with their State officials but makes provision for equalization of treatment of all certificate holders, by providing that residents of other States must receive an amount equal to that received by the residents of States with deposits, before the latter can share in the general assets of the bankrupt company (sec. 29).

Unlawful representations: The bill contains the usual provisions prohibiting misrepresentations and half-truths in registration statements, reports, and other documents filed with the Commission, and prohibiting the misrepresentation of the effect of registration with the Commission. In addition, the use of misleading names by registered investment companies is specifically prohibited. The latter provisions may be enforced by order of the Commission when the name is adopted after the effective date of the bill, and by a court at the suit of the Commission as to names theretofore adopted (secs. 34 (b), 35).

Administrative and enforcement machinery: The bill contains ample provisions, but appropriately circumscribed, for the enforcement of its provisions; for the carrying out of the powers and duties vested in the Commission, and for court review of the Commission's action (secs. 38 to 46, 49).

Formal provisions: The bill contains the usual provisions regarding validity of contracts, liability of controlling persons, the effect of the bill on existing law, and separability of provisions. The effective date of title I is November 1, 1940, as to all companies except face-amount certificate companies, as to which the bill does not become effective until January 1, 1941. The short title of the bill is the "Investment Company Act of 1940" (secs. 47, 48, 50 to 53).

TITLE II. INVESTMENT ADVISERS

Title II, which deals with investment advisory services, is an outgrowth of the Commission's survey of these organizations in connection with its study of investment trusts and investment companies. The subcommittee held hearings on the original provisions of title II as they were included in S. 3580. At these hearings representatives of the larger investment-adviser firms and representatives of a voluntary association of investment advisers opposed that title. However, at the conclusion of the hearings, much as in the case of the investment trusts and investment companies, representatives of the investment-adviser organizations and the Securities and Exchange Commission, at the suggestion of the chairman of the subcommittee, conferred with a view to drafting proposals which would have the support of the investment advisers and the Commission. As a result, title II of S. 4108 was prepared. This title has the affirmative support of virtually all investment advisers, both the members of the association and those who are not members, who appeared before the committee.

GENERAL STATEMENT

Investment advisers are persons who for compensation engage in the business of advising others, either directly or through publication or writings as to the value of securities, or as to the advisability of investing in, purchasing, or selling securities or who for compensation and as part of a regular business issue or promulgate analyses or reports concerning securities.

The emergence of the investment adviser as an important occupation or profession did not occur until the World War. However, it was not until after 1929 that the investment adviser firms organized and increased rapidly. The number of investment advisers presently functioning has been difficult to ascertain. The Commission reported to the Congress that in connection with its study of these firms, it obtained replies to questionnaires from only 394 persons or firms which administer funds or give investment advice.

Similarly, it is difficult definitely to estimate the amount of funds under the influence or control of investment advisers. However, some idea of the size of the funds administered by investment advisers may be deduced from the fact that 51 firms for which information was obtainable by the Commission managed, supervised, and gave investment advice with respect to funds aggregating approximately $4,000,000,000.

The nature of the functions of investment advisers, their increasing widespread activities, their potential influence on security markets, and the dangerous potentialities of stock-market tipsters imposing upon unsophisticated investors convinces this committee that protection of investors requires the regulation of investment advisers on a national scale.

The report of the Commission to the Congress and the record before the committee is clear that the solution of the problems and abuses of investment advisory services—individuals and companies which either handle pools of liquid funds of the public or give advice with respect to security transactions—cannot be effected without Federal legislation.

Not only must the public be protected from the frauds and misrepresentations of unscrupulous tipsters and touts, but the bona fide investment counsel must be safeguarded against the stigma of the activities of these individuals. Virtually no limitations or restrictions exist with respect to the honesty and integrity of individuals who may solicit funds to be controlled, managed, and supervised. Persons who may have been convicted or enjoined by courts because of perpetration of securities fraud are able to assume the role of investment advisers. Individuals assuming to act as investment advisers at present can enter profit-sharing contracts which are nothing more than "heads I win, tails you lose" arrangements. Contracts with investment advisers which are of a personal nature may be assigned and the control of funds of investors may be transferred to others without the knowledge or consent of the client.

Title II recognizes that with respect to a certain class of investment advisers, a type of personalized relationship may exist with their clients. As a consequence, this relationship is a factor which should be considered in connection with the enforcement by the Commission of the provisions of this bill.

ANALYSIS OF PROVISIONS OF TITLE II

Findings and definitions: Sections 201 and 202 contain, respectively, the findings of the Congress with respect to investment advisers and the definitions of various terms used in title II. The term "investment adviser" is so defined as specifically to exclude banks, bank holding-company affiliates, lawyers, accountants, engineers, teachers, brokers (insofar as their advice is merely incidental to brokerage transactions for which they receive only brokerage commissions), publishers of bona fide newspapers, news magazines, or financial publications of general and regular circulation, and persons whose advice is limited to securities issued by the United States and certain instrumentalities of the United States. In addition, the Commission is authorized by rules and regulations or order to make certain further exceptions according to prescribed statutory standards.

Registration of investment advisers: Investment advisers who make use of the mails or instrumentalities of interstate commerce in connection with their investment advisory business, unless they fall within one of the specific exemptions provided in section 203 (b), are required to register by filing with the Commission an application for registration containing certain information, the character of which is specified in the bill. The administrative machinery for registration is similar to that provided in the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 for the registration of over-the-counter brokers and dealers. Registration may be denied or revoked if the registrant has within 10 years been convicted of a crime or is enjoined by a court in connection with a security or financial fraud, or if his application for registration is materially misleading. The data contained in the application for registration must be kept reasonably current by such annual and special reports as the Commission may require for that purpose (secs. 203, 204).

Investment advisory contracts: Contracts or agreements between an investment adviser and a client may not provide for compensation to the investment adviser based upon capital gains or capital appreciation. Each such contract must be nonassignable and must provide, if the investment adviser is a partnership, that the client will be notified of any change in the membership of the firm, so that he will be in a position, if he so desires, to disaffirm the contract (sec. 205).

Certain prohibited transactions: Transactions and practices which defraud or operate as a fraud or deceit upon clients or prospective clients are prohibited. Registered investment advisers are also forbidden to purchase securities from or sell securities to any client, either as principal or in connection with a brokerage business, without first advising the client of the transaction and obtaining his consent thereto (sec. 206).

Unlawful representations, administrative and enforcement machinery, and formal provisions: In these respects title II contains provisions generally comparable to those of title I (secs. 207 to 221, inclusive). Section 210, which relates to publicity, recognizes that in many instances the adviser-client relationship has a confidential basis, and provides for confidential treatment of information obtained in the administration and enforcement of the title, to the extent that such treatment is consistent with efficient enforcement.

SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION,
Washington, August 1, 1940.

The Honorable ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Chairman, Banking and Currency Committee, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WAGNER: The Securities and Exchange Commission, in conjunction with representatives of the National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc., and the Investment Bankers Association, suggests the enclosed modification of section 8 (a) of the Securities Act of 1933, as amended, for the consideration of the Congress and respectfully urges that it may be enacted at the present session.

The Commission and the representatives of the National Association of Securities Dealers and the Investment Bankers Association wish to make it clear to the Members of the Congress that this proposal is experimental. They have already agreed to present to Congress in January their joint and several views as to modifications of this statute, based on study and conferences to be conducted in the meantime. They all, therefore, expressly wish to reserve the right to make, at that time, any further suggestions for the modification of section 8 (a) which they may believe to be desirable.

The representatives of the National Association of Securities Dealers and the Investment Bankers Association express the view that the proposed amendment should be helpful, although not a complete solution of the problem. They, therefore, intend in January to make suggestions for further changes in this section as well as in other sections of the act, but in order to make it possible to shorten the time in which securities may be registered and offered, they join in the request that this single amendment be enacted into law at the earliest possible moment during the present session of the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT E. HEALY,
Acting Chairman Securities and Exchange Commission.
FRANCIS A. BONNER,
Chairman, National Securities Dealers Association, Inc.
E. F. CONNELY,
President, Investment Bankers Association of America.

SELECTIVE-SERVICE COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I intend to make a motion, but in connection with that motion I wish to make a statement to the Senate.

I move that the Senate proceed to consider Senate bill 4164, Calendar No. 2110, the so-called military training bill, not with a view to taking it up this afternoon, but to make it the unfinished business, and then have it go over until tomorrow.

I wish to state that I have been asked whether it is the program to have a session Saturday. I am prepared to say to Senators that we shall not have a session this coming Saturday, but I can hold out no such assurance for any subsequent Saturdays until this program has been completed.

I wish to say that in addition to the bill which is the subject of my motion there is in the offing a tax bill which will probably be considered in the House in the next few days and sent to the Senate. There is also pending in the Committee on Appropriations the $4,800,000,000 measure which the House recently passed, and which will soon be reported by the committee.

As to one or two of these measures, if not all of them, the element of time is of extreme importance, and therefore it is very urgent that the Senate devote itself without interruption to the consideration of these measures until they are disposed of, and it may be necessary to have, and I hope Senators will prepare themselves for, Saturday sessions after the coming Saturday, but there will be no session of the Senate next Saturday.

With that statement, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4164.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) the Congress hereby declares that it is imperative to increase and train the personnel of the armed forces of the United States.

(b) The Congress further declares that in a free society the obligations and privileges of military training and service should be shared generally in accordance with a fair and just system of selective compulsory military training and service.

(c) The Congress further declares, in accordance with our traditional military policy as expressed in the National Defense Act of 1916, as amended, that it is essential that the strength and organization of the National Guard as an integral part of the first-line defenses of this Nation be at all times maintained and assured. To this end it is the intent of the Congress that whenever the Congress shall determine that troops are needed for the national security in excess of those of the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, or such part thereof as may be necessary, shall be ordered to active Federal service and continued therein so long as such necessity exists.

SEC. 2. Except as provided in section 5 (a), it shall be the duty of every male citizen of the United States, and of every male alien residing in the United States, who is between the ages of 21 and 31, on the day or days fixed for registration, to present himself for and submit to registration at such time and place, and in such manner and in such age group, as shall be determined by rules and regulations prescribed hereunder.

SEC. 3. (a) Every male citizen of the United States, and every male alien residing in the United States who has declared his intention to become such a citizen, beween the ages of 21 and 31 (other than those excepted from registration under section 5 (a)), shall be liable for training and service in the land and naval forces of the United States. The President is authorized, whether or not a state of war exists, to select for training and service in the manner herein provided, and to induct into the land and naval forces of the United States, such number of men between such ages as in his judgment is required for such forces in the national interest: Provided, That any person between the ages of 18 and 35 shall be afforded an opportunity voluntarily to enlist and be inducted into the land or naval forces of the United States for the training and service prescribed in subsection (b), if he is acceptable to the land or naval forces for such training and service. The men inducted into the land or naval forces for such training and service shall be assigned to camps or units of such forces.

(b) Whenever the United States is not at war, each man so inducted shall serve for a training period of 12 consecutive months, unless sooner discharged: Provided, That if during his training period the Congress shall declare that the national interest is imperiled, he may be required to remain in service until the Congress shall declare that the national interest permits his being relieved from such service. Each such man, after completion of the service required by this subsection, shall be transferred to a Reserve component of the land or naval forces of the United States until the provisions of this act become inoperative, or until the expiration of a period of 10 years, or until he is discharged from such Reserve component, whichever event first occurs; and during the period that he is a member of such Reserve component he shall be subject to such additional training and service as may now or hereafter be prescribed by law: Provided, That any man who completes 12 months' training and service in the land forces in time of peace, as provided herein, who thereafter completes not less than 2 years' satisfactory service in the Regular Army or in the active National Guard, shall, upon completion of such service, be relieved from further liability to serve in the Reserve components of the Army of the United States in time of peace.

(c) The men inducted for training and service as provided for in this section shall, during the period of their training and service, receive the same pay, allowances, and other benefits as are provided by law for enlisted men of like grades and length of service of that component of the land or naval forces to which they are assigned, and after transfer to a Reserve component of the land or naval forces as provided in subsection (b) they shall receive the same benefits as are provided by law in like cases for members of such Reserve component. Men in such training and service shall have an opportunity to qualify for promotion.

SEC. 4. (a) The selection of men for the training and service provided for in section 3 (other than those who enlist voluntarily pursuant to this act) shall be made in an impartial manner, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, from all the men between the ages of 21 and 31 who are liable for such training and service.

(b) Quotas of men to be furnished for such training and service shall be determined for each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia, and for subdivisions thereof, on the basis of the actual number of men in the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and the subdivisions thereof, who are liable for such training and service but who are not deferred after classification, credits shall be given in fixing such quotas for residents of such subdivisions who are in the land and naval forces of the United States on the date fixed for determining such quotas; and until the actual numbers necessary for determining the quotas are known, the quotas may be based on estimates, and subsequent adjustments therein made when such actual numbers are known; all in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

SEC. 5. (a) Commissioned officers, warrant officers, field clerks, pay clerks, and enlisted men of the Regular Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Coast Guard, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the federally recognized active National Guard, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Regular Army Reserve, the Enlisted Reserve Corps, the Naval Reserve, and the Marine Corps Reserve; cadets, United States Military Academy, midshipmen, United States Naval Academy; cadets, United States Coast Guard Academy; and cadets of the advanced course, senior division, Reserve Officers' Training Corps; and diplomatic representatives, technical attachés of foreign embassies and legations, consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, and consular agents of foreign countries, residing in the United States, who are not citizens of the United States, or who have not declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, shall not be required to be registered under section 2. No exceptions from registration shall continue after the cause therefor ceases to exist: Provided, That any officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man of the Regular Army who is excepted from registration under section 2 and who shall have served therein satisfactorily for a period of 3 years, and any officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man of the active National Guard or a member of the Officers' Reserve Corps on the eligible list, who is excepted from such registration and who shall have served therein satisfactorily for a period of 6 years, shall be excepted from such registration and further duty in the Reserve components of the Army of the United States in time of peace: Provided further, That any officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man of the active National Guard who satisfactorily serves as a member of the Army of the United States, in active Federal service for the period of 1 year, who thereafter completes not less than 2 years' satisfactory service in the Regular Army or in the active National Guard, shall, upon completion of such service, be relieved from further liability to serve in the Reserve components of the Army of the United States in time of peace.

(b) The Vice President of the United States, and the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States, and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, while holding such official positions shall be deferred from training and service in the land and naval forces of the United States.

(c) The President is authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to defer training and service under this act in the land and naval forces of the United States of those men whose employment in industry, agriculture, or other occupations or employment is found to be necessary to the maintenance of the national health, safety, or interest, and the President shall defer training and service under this act in the land and naval forces of the United States of regular or duly ordained ministers of religion engaged in the regular discharge of their ministerial duties. No deferment of training and service shall be made in the case of any individual except upon the basis of the status of such individual, and except in the case of regular or duly ordained ministers no such deferment shall be made of individuals by occupational groups or of groups of individuals in any plant or institution. The President is also authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to defer the training and service under this act in the land and naval forces of the United States (1) of those men in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their deferment advisable, and (2) of those men found to be physically, mentally, or morally deficient. No deferment of such training and service shall continue after the cause therefor ceases to exist.

(d) Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to require any person to be subject to combatant training or service in the land or naval forces of the United States who, by reason of religious training and belief, is conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form. All persons claiming such exemption from combatant training and service because of such conscientious objections shall be listed on a Register of Conscientious Objectors at the time of their classification by a local board, and the names of the persons so registered shall be at once referred by such local board to the Department of Justice for inquiry and hearing. After appropriate inquiry by the proper agency of the Department of Justice, a hearing shall be held by the Department of Justice in the case of each such person with respect to the character and good faith of his objections, and such person shall be notified of the time and place of such hearing. The Department shall, after such hearing, if the objections are found to be sustained, recommend (1) that the objector shall be assigned to noncombatant service as defined by the President, or (2) if the objector is found to be conscientiously opposed to participation in such noncombatant service, that he shall be assigned to work of national importance under civilian direction. If, after such hearing, the objections of any such person are found not to be sustained, the objector and the local board shall be immediately notified thereof, the name of the objector shall then be removed from the Register of Conscientious Objectors, and such objector shall thereafter be liable to training and service as provided by this act. If, within 5 days after the date of such findings by the Department of Justice, the objector or the local board gives notice to the other of disagreement with such findings, the local board shall immediately refer the matter for final determination to an appropriate appeal board established pursuant to section 10 (a) (2).

SEC. 6. The President shall have no authority to induct persons into the land and naval forces of the United States under this act until Congress shall hereafter appropriate funds specifically for such purpose.

SEC. 7. No bounty shall be paid to induce any person to enlist in or be inducted into the land or naval forces of the United States: Provided, That the clothing or enlistment allowances authorized by law shall not be regarded as bounties within the meaning of this section. No person liable to service in such forces shall be permitted or allowed to furnish a substitute for such service; no such substitute shall be received, enlisted, enrolled, or inducted into the land or naval forces of the United States; and no person liable to service in such forces shall be permitted to escape such service or be discharged therefrom prior to the expiration of his term of service by the payment of money or any other valuable thing whatsoever as consideration for his release from service in such forces or liability thereto.

SEC. 8. (a) Any member of any Reserve component of the land or naval forces who is on active duty, and any person inducted into the land or naval forces under this act who, in the judgment of those in authority over him, satisfactorily completes the service required under this act shall be entitled to a certificate to that effect upon the completion of such service, which shall include a record of any special proficiency or merit attained.

(b) In the case of any such person who has left a position or by reason of being so inducted into such forces is required to leave a position, other than a temporary position, in the employ of any employer and who (1) receives such certificate of satisfactory service, (2) is still qualified to perform the duties of such position, and (3) makes application for reemployment within 40 days after he is relieved from such service—

(A) if such position was in the employ of the United States Government, its Territories or possessions, or the District of Columbia, such person shall be restored to such position or to a position of like status and pay;

(B) if such position was in the employ of a private employer, such employer shall restore such person to such position or to a position of like status and pay unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so;

(C) if such position was in the employ of any State or political subdivision thereof, it is hereby declared to be the sense of the Congress that such person should be restored to such position or to a position of like status and pay.

(c) Any person who is restored to a position in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (A) or (B) of subsection (b) shall be so restored without loss of seniority, insurance participation or benefits, or other benefits, and such person shall not be discharged from such position without cause within 1 year after such restoration.

(d) The failure or refusal of any private employer to comply with the provisions of paragraph (B) of subsection (b) or with the provisions of subsection (c) shall be an unfair labor practice within the meaning of and for all the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act.

(e) In any case in which no remedy is available under the National Labor Relations Act to require compliance by any private employer with the provisions of this section, the district court of the United States for any district in which such employer maintains a place of business shall have power, upon the filing of a motion, petition, or other appropriate pleading by the person entitled to the benefits of such provisions, to specifically require such employer to comply with such provisions. The court shall order a speedy hearing in any such case and shall advance it on the calendar.

(f) The Director of Selective Service herein provided for shall establish a Personnel Division with adequate facilities to render aid in the replacement in their former positions of persons who have satisfactorily completed their service under this act, and to aid such persons in finding employment elsewhere if such replacement in their former positions is impossible or unreasonable.

(g) The Chief of Finance, United States Army, is hereby designated, empowered, and directed to act as the fiscal, disbursing, and accounting agent of the Director of Selective Service in carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. Any person charged as herein provided with the duty of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act, or the rules or regulations made or directions given thereunder, who shall knowingly fail or neglect to perform such duty, and any person charged with such duty, or having and exercising any authority under said act, rules, regulations, or directions who shall knowingly make, or be a party to the making, of any false, improper, or incorrect registration, classification, physical or mental examination, deferment, induction, enrollment, or muster, and any person who shall make, or be a party to the making of, any false statement or certificate as to the fitness or unfitness or liability or nonliability of himself or any other person for service under the provisions of this act, or rules, regulations, or directions made pursuant thereto, or who otherwise evades registration or service in the land or naval forces or any of the requirements of this act, or who counsels, aids, or abets another to evade registration or service in the land or naval forces or any of the requirements of this act, or of said rules, regulations, or directions, or who in any manner shall knowingly fail or neglect to perform any duty required of him under or in the execution of this act, or rules or regulations made in pursuance of this act, or any person or persons who shall knowingly hinder or interfere in any way by force or violence with the administration of this act or the rules or regulations made pursuant thereto, or conspire to do so, shall, upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than 5 years or a fine of not more than $10,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, or if subject to military or naval law may be tried by court martial, and, on conviction, shall suffer such punishment as a court martial may direct. In cases of persons subject to this act who fail to report for duty in the land or naval forces as ordered, military and naval courts martial shall have concurrent jurisdiction of offenses arising out of such failure. Precedence shall be given by courts to the trial of cases arising under this act.

SEC. 10. (a) The President is authorized—

(1) to prescribe the necessary rules and regulations to carry this act into effect;

(2) to create and establish a selective service system, to provide for the classification of registered men on the basis of availability for service and training and to establish local boards and such other agencies, including appeal boards and agencies of appeal, as he may deem necessary to carry the provisions of this act into effect;

(3) to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and fix the compensation, at a rate not in excess of $10,000 per annum, of a Director of Selective Service who shall be directly responsible to him, and to appoint and fix the compensation of such other officers, agents, and employees as he may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided, That any person so appointed whose salary is at a rate in excess of $5,000 per annum shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;

(4) to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the departments and agencies in the executive branch of the Government, and of the several States, Territories, possessions, and the District of Columbia, and the subdivisions thereof, in the execution of this act, and to require of each the performance of such duties as he directs in carrying out the provisions of this act;

(5) to have done such printing, binding, and blank-book work in such public or private printing establishments or binderies as he may designate, and to obtain such office equipment, as he may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, with or without advertising or formal contract; and

(6) to prescribe eligibility, rules, and regulations governing the parole for service in the land or naval forces, or for any other special service established pursuant to this act, of any person convicted of a violation of any of the provisions of this act.

(b) The President is authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to delegate any authority vested in him under this act to such officers, agents, or persons as he may designate or appoint for such purpose.

(c) The decisions of local boards with respect to any matters within their jurisdiction shall be final except where appeals are authorized in accordance with the provisions of this act and such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. In the administration of this act voluntary services may be accepted. Correspondence necessary in the execution of this act may be carried in official penalty envelopes.

SEC. 11. (a) Every person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon publication by the President of a proclamation or other public notice requiring registration.

(b) The provisions of this act shall be construed liberally to effect the purpose thereof, the spirit always controlling the letter, and any technical deficiencies therein shall be supplied by the reasonable intent of the act as a whole, in the light of national needs.

(c) If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

(d) Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to repeal, amend, or suspend the laws now in force authorizing voluntary enlistment or reenlistment in the land and naval forces of the United States, including the reserve components thereof.

SEC. 12. When used in this act—

(a) The term "between the ages of 21 and 31" shall refer to persons who have reached the twenty-first anniversary of the day of their birth and who have not reached the thirty-first anniversary of the day of their birth; and other terms designating different age groups shall be construed in a similar manner.

(b) The term "United States," when used in a geographical sense, shall be deemed to include the several States, the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the possessions of the United States, except the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 13. (a) All laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby suspended to the extent of such conflict for the period in which this act shall be in force.

(b) All the provisions of this act shall become inoperative and cease to apply on and after May 15, 1945, unless continued in effect by the Congress, except as to offenses committed prior to such date.

SEC. 14. This act may be cited as the "Selective Training and Service Act of 1940."

CLAIM OF THEODORE R. TROENDLE, FOR THE DAWSON SPRINGS CONSTRUCTION CO.—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 268)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, a bill (S. 4037) to confer jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the Western District of Kentucky to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of Theodore R. Troendle, for the Dawson Springs Construction Co.

It appears that in 1920 the Dawson Springs Construction Co., of Dawson Springs, Ky., entered into a contract with the United States for the construction of eight buildings for a United States Public Health Sanatorium at Dawson Springs, Ky. One of the provisions of the agreement required the Government to furnish rough lumber for use in connection with the project. It apparently is claimed that the lumber supplied by the Government was unsuitable for the purpose for which it was intended and that the contractor was required to purchase the necessary lumber at an expense of approximately $7,100.

It is evidently the purpose of the legislation to waive the statute of limitations against this claim so that the contractor may bring suit against the Government in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky. While I would have no objection to a bill properly limited to the ostensible purpose of the legislation and safeguarding the rights of the Government, I am constrained to disapprove the instant measure, because in its present form it is unfortunately subject to a number of serious objections.

The first proviso of the bill would permit a review by the Supreme Court on certiorari of any decision or judgment rendered in any suit filed under the authority of the act. This clause is subject to the construction that an application for a writ of certiorari may be made directly to the Supreme Court to review a judgment of the district court without an intermediate appeal to the circuit court of appeals. No reason is discernible for making such an exception from the usual procedure in this instance. It may be observed that it is not customary to include such a provision in private jurisdictional bills in which jurisdiction is conferred on a United States district court in respect to an individual claim.

Instead of proposing to confer on the court jurisdiction over the claim for alleged breach of contract, it would do so in respect to "losses or damages arising out of" the contract. Obviously the contractor may conceivably have sustained losses arising out of the contract not due to any breach on the part of the Government and for which the Government is in no wise responsible, either legally or morally. In the light of this circumstance the jurisdictional clause of the bill appears entirely too broad.

Contrary to the usual practice, the bill contains no limitation on the time within which suit may be brought.

While because of the foregoing objections I am impelled to return the bill without my approval, I also desire to call attention to two defects of the measure which should be corrected in the event that it should be passed in a revised form.

The contract out of which the claim arises was made by the United States with the Dawson Springs Construction Co. The bill would permit suit to be brought in behalf of Theodore R. Troendle for the Dawson Springs Construction Co. No explanation of Mr. Troendle's connection with the claim is vouchsafed.

The last proviso contained in the bill would prohibit the payment of attorneys' fees in an amount exceeding 10 percent of "the amount appropriated in this act," whereas, in fact, no appropriation would be made by the act, since it would merely confer jurisdiction on a specified court over the claim. While such a restriction is generally included in bills making direct appropriations for the payment of claims, in its present form it appears unsuitable to a jurisdictional measure.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, AUGUST 8, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., pastor of Gunton Temple Memorial Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Father, who art the great source of life and of light for each new day, to Thy power and Thy love we bring all our needs; to Thy greatness our littleness, to Thy strength our weakness, to Thy forgiving grace our hearts to be cleansed and renewed. The duties of this day are ours; its issues are Thine. Answer our aspirations by Thy divine inspiration. May we place our trust, not in the changing tides of time, but in the mercy and the majesty of Lord God omnipotent.

O Thou who art the author and disposer of human life, from whom our spirits have come and unto whom they return, with bowed heads and uncovered hearts we come into Thy presence. We mourn the loss of a beloved Member of this Congress. We are not murmuring or complaining, but only saying, "Lord, Thy will be done," for Thou dost give and Thou dost take away, and blessed is Thy name forevermore. Whatever was beautiful in his life, in Thy sight and in our sight, abides forever. We shall miss him because his place will be empty, but we thank Thee for the glad assurance that his soul is at home with the Lord, for he was numbered among those who seek to do justly, who love mercy, and walk humbly with their God, seeking to serve his generation according to Thine own holy will. We are not saying farewell, but only good night, hoping in that blessed morn to meet with all who have gone before him.

Thou who art the support of the weary and the consolation of the sorrowing, wilt Thou put Thine arms of love about the bereaved members of the family, sustaining them by Thy grace. May they avail themselves of the eternal companionship of the Christ, that friend who sticketh closer than a brother, who is willing to abide with us all, not for an hour, but throughout life and through eternity.

Wilt Thou also so teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom, and when our life's day is done, wilt Thou give us an abundant entrance into that eternal kingdom. We ask it in the name of the Christ, our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter that I have sent to the House Military Affairs Committee today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

THE FARM—THE HOPE OF AMERICA

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Speaker, it so often occurs in the heat of campaign that real issues are obscured. Basic facts are hidden. I desire to bring to your attention some facts concerning agriculture—farming as it is in southern Indiana. My district has much fine farm land but does not have the great farms of the prairies. Our farms are for the most part one-man farms, sometimes one man and his boys or a hired man. I grew to young manhood on such a farm in Washington County, Ind. I own the farm and operate it today and have for many years. It has been in our family for at least 125 years, owned by Joshua Crowe, Sr., later Joshua Crowe, Jr., and now by myself. You can see I have the background of a farmer, particularly the small farmer. His hands may be hard from honest toil, his clothes may be coarse, his shoes hard, but his heart is right, he is sympathetic and kindly and his toil feeds the millions of the earth.

In a recent news dispatch from Des Moines, Ia., Mr. Willkie, the Republican candidate for President, was headlined as saying that if elected President, "he would not take away any of the benefits gained by agriculture during the past several years." Gains for agriculture during the past several years undoubtedly mean gains under the New Deal. If the gains to agriculture are worth keeping, why not keep the gains for labor, for banking, protection to investors, the gains in reduced rates to all utility consumers—especially the million or more now enjoying rural electrification. Why not also continue aid to the youth through the C. C. C. and the N. Y. A.; the aid, through Social Security, to the widows, orphans, the blind, crippled, and the aged. In all of these great beneficial and far-reaching programs would Mr. Willkie keep only the farm program? Would he repeal all the others? Of course he would not repeal any of them.

The farm program could not be abolished without destroying many of the others because it is a closely integrated program, many phases of which overlap the others. To keep one, we should keep all. To destroy one would probably ultimately destroy them all.

The farmers have not forgotten the dark days leading up to 1933 and they are not going to give up their program of rehabilitation. No nation throughout all history has possessed a firmer foundation for its liberties, its traditions, and institutions than has our country, which has been given it largely by the American farmer. They have always labored at a great disadvantage against protected industry. Fortunately, their common ideal has always been for freedom of the individual, freedom consistent with the proper regard for the rights and privileges of others.

This is the kind of freedom the farmers are finding in the farm program under the present administration.

The greatness of America, which has permitted great industries to spring up, long lines of railways to girdle the continent, permitted great utilities to develop, all had its beginning in the early pioneer farm days. From the beginning of American history, the very foundation of our liberty has been found on the American farms from the very start of our earliest beginning in Virginia or Plymouth Rock, the basic social unit was established by the family on the family-owned farm. Destroy that farm and the farm family and you will destroy America. Build up that farm and that farm family and you will build up and make strong this great republic. In these troubled times more than at any time perhaps since the foundation of this Government, the family home-owned farm is today all important.

Some say the family home-owned farm must give way to modern methods of large-scale farming. This is not true. Fortunately, during the last 8 years under the very able leadership of this administration plus the leadership of the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, the American farmer is coming again into his own. The number of American home-owned farms is today at an all-time high. The majority of them are family owned and operated farms. Of course, the farm program will not be destroyed. No one will dare destroy this program and I have a lot of pleasure and satisfaction in having supported all of it.

While great strides have been made in machinery, science, culture, and art, nothing has or will ever take the place of the farmer. Labor-saving devices will make work easier, but the farmers' toil to a large extent goes on. Science and invention produce wonders in things only recently unthought of or unheard of, but the farmers' work goes on and on. But with all the science, nothing yet except the farmer has fed mankind. With all of our science and invention, nothing has been found to take the place of bread and bacon, potatoes and milk, all of which is produced on the farm. The farmers as a class work more hours, do more hard work than any other comparable group to be found anywhere. He took his wheat to the elevator and accepted the price offered. He asked the price of the binder or fertilizer and paid the price asked. The things he must buy at set prices cost more than his produce would bring at the fixed prices he was obliged to accept for them. This process went on for many years.

The farmer, through farm organizations, for years called on the two great parties for help. Year after year help was promised. Nothing was given him except the Farm Board preceeding 1933. During the heyday of business in the twenties the farmers were going broke. During the prosperity of the twenties, for the manufacturer, the merchant, industrialist, the banker, the lawyer, the farmer was going broke. But the two great parties were making promises to the farmer all the while. The year 1932 found the farmers all either broke or on the verge of bankruptcy. Few farmers were unmortgaged who were able to secure loans. Interest rates were high, averaging more than 6 percent. Under the old rate, the farmer with a $2,000 mortgage on his farm paid $120 per year interest. Under the present program, all farms that can qualify have been refinanced at 3½ percent interest. At this rate, on a $2,000 loan the farmer pays only $70. This item alone saves him $50 per year. Taxes were high. All farm products were low. July and August 1932, in my district I saw high-grade yellow corn selling at 8, 9, and 10 cents a bushel at the elevator. Grade-A wheat, 60 pounds to the bushel, was bringing 34 cents to 38 cents per bushel, and fine fat hogs bringing $2.50 to $2.85 per hundred pounds. All other farm products in proportion. I am sure no farmer can ever forget those lean years. Nothing but dogged determination could have saved the farmer as a whole.

Then this administration came into power March 4, 1933; the Nation had hit low. Immediate legislation to save us from total ruin was passed speedily. The farmer came in for his full share at the earliest possible moment. To give him a breathing spell, for a time a moratorium was declared on all foreclosures. In many cases where his credit has been exhausted crop loans were advanced. Corn, wheat, and cotton loans have been made on these products when placed in storage, thereby preventing ruinous low prices at harvest times. Farmer-controlled committees have been organized in every county and a cooperative spirit built up to where more than 75 percent of all farmers have joined in the program.

For more than 100 years legislation has been enacted to aid select and favored groups. Business programs have added to the costs of things the farmer must buy. Tariff, trusts, monopolies, and many other things have taken the farmers' profits. To offset this advantage a program of soil building and parity payments has been instituted. This program alone has and will continue to save many farmers from foreclosure and bankruptcy.

SOIL CONSERVATION

We have adopted a program of rebuilding and conserving the soil. Everyone, even though in city or town, as well as the country, is vitally interested in this program. A short drive in almost any rural community will show the dire distress of farmers on millions of acres of ground, gullied, eroded, much of it almost beyond repair. Marvelous work has been done to rebuild the land all over the country. The waste has been stopped in millions of gullies. The surface has been covered. The water has been retained. The water supply has been conserved, which aids in time of drought and lessens the crest of the floods. The water level is being raised in the earth through this program of soil coverage, low dams, and reforesting, all of which is a part of this great program. Would anyone try to put an end to all of this?

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

Rural electrification is the farmers' greatest blessing in the past 50 years. At the time the R. E. A. began to function, few rural communities had electricity. Now some 25 percent of farms of America have electricity. I hope for the day, and speedily, when every farm home in America which desires electricity can have it. For the past 5 years 200,000 farm homes per year have been supplied with electricity, or a total of 1,000,000 homes. In all these homes the same labor-saving devices can be installed as in the city homes—electric radios, ranges, irons, vacuum cleaners, washing machines, and so forth; electric lights in the barn, the outbuildings, and the garage. Electricity lifts the chores of the farm and home out of the drudgery class. It has brought to the farm home the comforts and conveniences of the cities. Any commodity that has become so important and necessary as electricity must be made at the cheapest rate rather than the highest. That is what Rural Electrification has done. It has reduced the price and broadened the field of service until millions are now enjoying its blessing who could never have afforded it through the big utilities. It has brought joy to millions of people. I want it brought to millions more. Would anyone call this a failure? Would anyone attempt or offer to end this great program? No; they would not.

INTEREST RATES TO FARM OWNERS

The Farm Credit Administration covers all types of farm credit. More farmers were refinanced in 4 years of this program we established than for many years before. Refinancing was made at the lowest rate ever before made in this or any other great country. Cooperatives have been financed. Production-credit and crop-loan loans have financed immediate needs of the farmer. High interest rates have always been the curse of the farmer. They have kept him in debt. The low interest rates we have given him were not to get him in debt, but to get him out of debt. Out of debt, the farmer can sell his crops when and where he desires, free to sell when and where he chooses.

INCOME OF THE FARMER

The farmer is never overpaid for his product. He is usually underpaid. The income of the farmer is not what it should be. I have been acquainted and connected with the farm for more than a half century. During all that time I have never seen the farmer get too much for his product. He usually gets far too small an amount. The income, however, of the farmer in 1939 was more than double his income in 1932. The farm buying power in 1939 was 72 percent more than in 1932. From 1921 to 1929 they loaned $8,000,000,000 to foreign countries to stimulate foreign purchases; then in 1930 they passed the high-tariff act, which curtailed world trade, thereby we lost our money which they had loaned and lost our world trade.

AID TO FARMER NOT A SUBSIDY

Critics contend money expended on the farmer is a subsidy. It is not a subsidy. It is an evening up at this late date with the manufacturer. Manufactured goods in the United States in 1937 was $60,000,000,000, of which more than 80 percent was protected by tariff. The average rate reduced to ad valorem basis was near 36 percent. It has been estimated this added to increased industrial prices at least $6,000,000,000—a subsidy to business. The farmer has to pay his full share of that subsidy. He is entitled to a set-off, an evening up, fair play. This is only an adjustment of the differences.

I shall continue support of this program as long as it is necessary to offset the disadvantages which the farmer has to pay.

All in all, this administration, of which I am happy to be a part, has set up machinery, has passed laws which, if continued, will bring the farmer into his own. I have supported this program. I have voted for this program. It is aiding in bringing prosperity to the people on the farm. Why should not the farmer, the landowner, the people who feed the world, have their full share of pay for their service? Does not the Good Book say—First Corinthians, ninth chapter, seventh verse: "Who planteth a vinyard and eateth not of the fruit thereof"? [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. EDELSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDELSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, on August 7 the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER] rose on the floor of this House and stated that a prominent Jewish Rabbi of Cincinnati, who was formerly a Democrat, came out for Mr. Willkie.

The newspapers publish such items constantly in what seems an inspired publicity campaign, but I am surprised that such statements should be made in the House as well. The purpose and object of heralding the fact that a prominent American of Jewish faith has announced his support of one candidate or another is not merely to record that fact but also to have it imply, or create the impression, that citizens of Jewish faith, as a group, are in favor of one candidate or another. To endeavor to create a sentiment or get votes upon religious grounds is, to my mind, un-American. To endeavor to create the illusion that Americans of Jewish faith vote as Jews, in one bloc, is also un-American, unfair, and unjust.

I believe that the Jews of America, whether they vote for one side or the other, be it Mr. Willkie or Mr. Roosevelt, vote not as Jews but as Americans, and I deny that there is a Jewish vote cast as such, just as I deny the idea of a Polish vote, of a Russian vote, of an Irish vote, or of an Italian vote, or any other racial vote.

I come from a district which is composed of Jews, Italians, Russians, Poles, Ukrainians, Hungarians, Irish, and also Germans, and these people belong to many different faiths. They do not vote in racial or national groups, as Italians, Jews, Russians, Poles, Ukrainians, Hungarians, Irish, or Germans, but they vote as Americans, and only as Americans will they cast their ballots on election day, not because they are Jews, not because they are Italians, not because they are Russians, not because they are Poles, not because they are Ukrainians, not because they are Hungarians, not because they are Irish, not because they are Germans; and when their votes are counted they will declare that they believe in the principles of the New Deal and the principles of President Roosevelt. Their votes and their ideals show that they vote as Americans only, and I trust and hope that no party will ever endeavor to achieve office by attempting to claim that they have control of the votes of a particular race, creed, or color. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, ever since the day I entered Congress, I have supported without exception the recommendations of the War and Navy Departments, as well as bills reported by the Committees on Military and Naval Affairs, which had for their purpose an adequate national defense. Of course, I regret that for about 15 years, starting in 1920, we did practically nothing to improve our national defense. It was a fatal mistake that we scrapped the vessels that were three-fourths completed as a result of the disarmament conference during the Harding administration.

We all know during the entire period that President Hoover occupied the White House we did not lay down one naval vessel.

The situation throughout the world today requires us to prepare; and so far as I am aware, the citizens of this country stand squarely behind the President in the recommendations he has made to the Congress providing for ships as well as equipment for our Army.

In a period such as this, the Congress receives many suggestions. Among the very important suggestions that have come to us recently is the question of conscription. The President, and I think any fair-minded person in time of war or when a great emergency confronts us, will admit that conscription would be fair to all. It is the democratic way. However, I doubt the wisdom of providing for conscription at this time because I have not come to the conclusion that it is absolutely necessary, or that the Army and Navy are ready now to train a million let alone 2,000,000 men.

When the hearings were held upon the last appropriation bill for money for the Army and Navy for additional planes, equipment, and so forth, the Secretary of War, Mr. Stimson, in reply to a question as to why the National Guard as a whole would not be called out, stated it was because we did not have the necessary facilities. He mentioned that housing was absolutely essential and stated that at the outset they would only call certain units of the National Guard. He was immediately supported by Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff.

When we do not have the necessary facilities to take care of the entire National Guard, how can we be in a position to conscript a million men for service at this time? Where will you house them? What will you use to train them with?

I do not feel it should be said that we cannot secure sufficient voluntary enlistments at this period.

As an alternative for conscription, I would offer the following suggestions:

First. Determine whether the Census Bureau can supply from the last census information that would enable the compiling of the names of all eligible for service. If that cannot be furnished, then authorize the registration at once but do not extend the power to conscript at this time.

Second. Agree to provide all facilities necessary to any educational institution in the United States, private or public, for voluntary military training.

Third. Extend the same facilities to the Civilian Conservation Corps for voluntary military training.

Fourth. Provide for 1-year enlistments in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

Fifth. Give the President the authority at once to call out the National Guard and the Officers Reserve Corps, as he has requested. Extend the same authority as to the Naval Reserve if it is requested.

Sixth. Require the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to change their present policy as well as rules and regulations, relative to enlistments, so that men with minor defects such as a missing tooth or an injured toe will not be denied the right to enlist. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have presented these suggestions to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

I have received letters from hundreds of young men who have been denied the right to enlist in the Army and Navy, especially those who desire to be flying cadets. The restrictions have been such that the young men just could not meet them. Many of the boys could not meet the educational requirements, having lacked 2 years in college.

It might be it would not be advisable to require the Air Corps to reduce the period of enlistment to 1 year, but I do understand that a 2-year enlistment would enable them to properly train a man for combat service. One year would be sufficient for other branches of the service.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the program I have suggested will get all the personnel we can handle at this time. If, at some future date, conscription should be necessary, then the registration would be at hand and the Army could move without delay.

The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy want conscription now, and still the Secretary of War tells an official committee of this House the War Department cannot call out the entire National Guard because it is not in a position to take care of them.

When the winter months come on, where will the men be housed? Build all the equipment necessary, get the planes, the tanks, and so forth, and when we have a sufficient number, then will be the time to consider calling men for training if the situation demands.

Give the young men of this Nation a chance to get into all branches of the service and do not deprive them of a chance to enlist because they have not been to college. I have found practical men are equal to men with college education.

Only last week I had the case of a young man nearly 6 foot tall, weight 178 pounds, hard as a rock, 4 years at college and 4 years in business, but he could not get his application accepted for an opportunity to become an ensign in the Navy because he was 27 years of age, 26 being the age limit. Does not this seem foolish on the face of it? Of course, voluntary enlistment will fail if such requirements are not set aside. Those who want to enlist will be more contented than the man who is conscripted.

Mr. Speaker, a situation exists at this very time that should convince the people of this country that in case of war approximately a million men could be put in the field immediately. The mobile ground forces of approximately 750,000 men are engaged in the biggest maneuvers the Army has ever held in peacetime this month. This is not my view, but an official statement from the War Department. The Department said about 85 percent of the mobile Regular Army and the National Guard troops and Organized Reserves for the next 21 days will take part in maneuvers scattered over five areas. Naturally, it would be this group that would be called first in the event of war.

It is my firm conviction that no matter how the Army officers feel on the subject Congress will eventually demand modern mechanization of our Army. In past years the Infantry, so far as the Army was concerned, was the first line of defense. It has been demonstrated in the war abroad that the infantry is helpless in combating modern equipment, such as tanks, and so forth. If we will train our Regulars so that they will be efficient in the operation of tanks, and the Army will provide for a sufficient number of tanks out of the appropriations we have placed at their disposal, we will be making great strides in providing a proper national defense.

Aside from this, the Army should expedite its program of securing planes, training pilots to operate them, and mechanics to keep them in proper condition. Surely there is a limit to the number of men that we can use at this time, because we must confess we do not have the equipment to train a million men. Right at this moment near Ogdensburg, N. Y., wooden guns are being used to train Regulars, Reserves, and National Guard men. That demonstrates we lack equipment.

It seems to me unless the War and Navy Departments get together on equipment the President is going to be required to step in and provide for an investigation to determine what is the best for our armed forces. For instance, there is a difference of opinion at the present time as to what make of rifle is the best weapon. The Army is going ahead on a large scale purchasing the new Garand rifle, while the Marine Corps, after using this rifle for 1 year, says the old Springfield rifle, with certain improvements, is the superior weapon. This seems to me to be of sufficient importance for a thorough investigation. The Marine Corps says there will be a test early in this month of a new semiautomatic rifle submitted by the Winchester Repeating Arms Co. The Commandant of the Marine Corps, Major General Holcomb, is quoted as saying they have seen a demonstration of these rifles and it appears to the Marine Corps it is the complete answer to what they need, and it will cost about one-half the cost of the Garand rifle. The Marine Corps had one battalion equipped with the Garand rifle for 1 year and it is on the basis of their report that they have about concluded that the Winchester rifle is sufficient for their need. If this rifle, costing one-half the cost of the Garand rifle, is suitable for the Marine Corps, why should it not be suitable for the Army?

Mr. Speaker, if the plan I suggest is put into execution and fails, I will vote for conscription, but at the present time I do not feel it is necessary.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter and I also ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, many of us were interested in a program that was to be taken up in the House today, but on account of the passing of one of our distinguished Members, we have decided there will be no program today, and I do hope in these 1-minute speeches there will be nothing of a political nature.

The SPEAKER. The Chair joins in that request.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like, if I may do so, to submit to Members of the House that even minute addresses be postponed unless they are of an emergency nature. If they can be postponed until the next session of the House, the members of the Judiciary Committee would greatly appreciate it.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are we going to have any bills up for consideration today?

Mr. RAYBURN. We have no legislative program at all for today and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] has a resolution to introduce in a moment when he can get the floor.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, in view of the request, I withdraw my unanimous-consent request.

Mr SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, if I may, I wish to express the appreciation of the Committee on the Judiciary for the very great consideration the gentleman from California has shown.

SENATE BILL REFERRED

A bill of the Senate of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 3524. An act conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claims of the Choctaw Indians of the State of Mississippi; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE W. BEN GIBBS

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound sorrow that I announce to the House the sudden and untimely death last night of our distinguished and beloved colleague, Hon. W. BEN GIBBS, of the Eighth Congressional District of Georgia.

Only yesterday he was here with us in the discharge of his duties, which brings to our minds the frailty and uncertainty of life.

Mr. GIBBS was serving his first term in Congress, but had, nevertheless, attracted the favorable attention of his colleagues as an outstanding Member of this body. On account of his profound legal ability he was given an assignment on the important Judiciary Committee. He was capable and efficient in the performance of his duties and his sudden death brings to a close a long period of public service.

Before coming to Congress he was solicitor of the city court of Jesup, Ga., and for 14 years was solicitor general of the Brunswick judicial circuit.

In his passing the Eighth District and the State of Georgia have lost an outstanding citizen and the Nation a faithful Representative.

Mr. Speaker, at a later and more appropriate time the House will pay proper respect to his memory.

Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution:

House Resolution 566

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. W. BEN GIBBS, a Representative from the State of Georgia.

Resolved, That a committee of four Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Speaker appointed the following funeral committee on the part of the House: Mr. BROWN of Georgia, Mr. PETERSON of Georgia, Mr. PACE, and Mr. CAMP.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the concluding paragraph of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), pursuant to the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until Monday, August 12, 1940, at 12 o'clock noon.

CONSCRIPTION OF WEALTH

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the Senate of the United States calmly proceeds on its way in spite of the symptoms of fear and hysteria evidenced in numerous places in our land.

Yet Congress, at times, has a great deal to do with precipitating that fear and hysteria. In times like these, phrases or words seem to take on additional meaning to certain persons. Some persons are in the mood of looking for magic remedies.

I rise today to say just a word in relation to that seldom comprehended, much abused and much misunderstood phrase "conscription of wealth." It has been used so much of late by one of our distinguished Members when, with the fervor of an ancient prophet, he calls out, "If you conscript men you must likewise conscript wealth."

This is appealing language, but deceptive language. Conscripting wealth, the phrase would imply, is a remedy. A remedy for what?

Let us analyze the meaning of the phrase. As generally understood, conscription of wealth means virtually a capital levy. But what does a capital levy mean, and what effect would it have upon any program we were undertaking? It would result in the depletion of capital in every industrial and economic endeavor of our people. It undoubtedly would increase unemployment, lower values, and add to the mental confusion of our people.

Let us see how the capital levy would apply to a farm, an industry, a business, or a home. Suppose the levy were 20 percent, and the farm were worth $20,000. There would be a $4,000 levy on the farm. If a business institution were worth $10,000,000, and the levy were 20 percent, there would be a $2,000,000 levy. If a home were worth $20,000, the levy would be $4,000.

I do not rise today to make any particular argument on the subject. There are two things that provoked my remarks:

First, the constant reference to conscription of wealth by the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE].

Secondly, an article by Westbrook Pegler, appearing today in the Washington Post.

Among other things, Mr. Pegler says:

> Wealth isn't just stock certificates and sawbucks. It is the property, and when the Government conscripts the property, then eventually the Government becomes the only employer in the country, and its orders to the employees are not to be disregarded or argued, as in the free countries.

I expect to speak at length on this subject a little later in the session. I ask that Mr. Pegler's article be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAIR ENOUGH—CONSCRIPT WEALTH?

(By Westbrook Pegler)

Excuse me, friends, but do I understand you to say that if men are to be conscripted for military training or war, then wealth should be conscripted, too?

Because, before I bet on that proposition, I want to take another squint at my hand.

Now, as I read the cards, I observe that men are conscripted to defend the wealth of a country because the life and freedom of the people are based on the possession of that wealth; and, of course, it sounds handsome to say that the wealth of a nation should belong equally to all the people, but if you will take a look around you will observe that freedom exists only in those countries in which the wealth, or most of it, is privately owned and shifted from one possessor to another in constant toil, trade, competition, and speculation.

I don't know why it works out that way, but it does. In Russia, Germany, and Italy the wealth belongs entirely to the state, or, in your way of speaking, to all the people, equally, and the result is that no individual, except the few bosses, has any wealth at all or any of the rights that Americans enjoy.

They can't speak out of turn; they can be shot for reading forbidden material or listening to forbidden stations on the air; they have to work where they are put as many hours as they are told to; they can't quit one job to seek another or sass the boss or strike or even mention the idea of organizing a union.

And they have to serve in armies and fight in wars, too, even with no prospect of acquiring any wealth of their own if they happen not to be killed.

When the war is over, if they live, back they go to their tasks. The farmer is staked to his farm on a short tether, and, though he may think he owns it, that is only an illusion. Let him fall behind the production figured out for him by the nation and they chase him down the road, and his family with him, and give the farm to someone else who will work harder and better and for a bare living.

Or if he just happens to be in wrong with the local boss he can be chased off down the road or slapped into a concentration camp, where the guards will beat his ears off, while the farm is given to someone who happens to be in right with the boss—perhaps the boss' cousin or the father of some dolly that the boss is playing around with.

If he is a white-collar or a hand worker in a plant, he can be hoisted out of a job in his home town and sent somewhere 'way to hell and gone in a strange part of the country because they happen to need his kind of talent there.

That is what has to happen in a country where you conscript the wealth as well as the man. It has to happen, and it does happen, because when the government of a nation takes over the wealth it becomes the owner of all the farms and factories, as well as the diamond bracelets and the stocks and bonds.

Wealth isn't just stock certificates and sawbucks. It is the property; and when the government conscripts the property, then eventually the government becomes the only employer in the country, and its orders to the employees are not to be disregarded or argued, as in the free countries.

The government's orders as the employer and the boss are not mere orders but law, and you know what happens when you disobey a law of the government, especially in time of national danger. They send for the secret police and give you a quick trial, and you go to the "clink" if they don't take a notion to shoot you.

So, on reading my hand carefully, I have to bet against your proposition that wealth should be conscripted along with men. If you are going to do that, there is no reason to conscript the men, because this country's only reason for doing that is to fight off the very thing that would happen here the minute we decided to conscript wealth.

THE UNITED AUTOMOBILE WORKERS OF TODAY

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the United Automobile Workers, in convention at St. Louis a few days ago, adopted a resolution condemning communistic activities on the part of anyone connected in any way with their organization, and condemning communism generally.

A very fine editorial was published in the Detroit Free Press immediately thereafter. It is only five paragraphs long, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be read at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the editorial will be read.

The legislative clerk read the editorial, as follows:

[From the Detroit Free Press of August 6, 1940]

THE UNITED AUTOMOBILE WORKERS OF TODAY

By all odds the most eloquent feature of the third annual motor festival in Flint was the presence in the parade of a C. I. O. float riding alongside displays by the manufacturers and applauded on every hand with enthusiasm.

That item in the pagentry symbolized an industrial harmony and good will which 3 years ago few would have dared prophesy.

It meant that in so brief a period relations between employers and employees, which were an anxiety to the whole country, have been placed on a plane of understanding because men on both sides remembered they were Americans, put aside teeth gnashing, and met together and threshed out differences on the basis of reason and intelligence.

As one consequence, the United Automobile Workers today is a civic and patriotic force in Flint, with a membership held in respect and pledged to defend and preserve the peace of the country.

In condemning communistic Russia as a brutal and predatory dictatorship with which we can have no fellowship, the convention of the United Automobile Workers in St. Louis indicates that what is true of the organization in Flint is largely true of it generally.

SELECTIVE-SERVICE COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, inasmuch as some time has been taken up with the introduction of various communications and letters, I wish to introduce into the RECORD the action of the American Federation of Labor in regard to the bill now before us, if it has not already been inserted. In doing so I shall read portions of a statement issued by the President of the Federation so that it may be understood.

President William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, today issued the following statement, dated August 5, 1940:

Developments which have taken place in the war situation in Europe have served to arouse feelings of apprehension among all classes of people and a conscicousness of the need of the formation of a constructive, practical national-defense policy. This state of mind is reflected in the action which Congress took when it appropriated large sums of money for the construction of naval vessels, airplanes, tanks, and war materials. While public opinion showed its opposition to the involvement of our Nation in the European conflict, it responded most favorably to the need for home defense and adequate preparation against any attempt of invasion by an aggressor nation.

I will reread the last sentence, so that it may be emphasized in this body, which perhaps has forgotten the fundamental principle upon which this Nation was founded:

While public opinion showed its opposition to the involvement of our Nation in the European conflict, it responded most favorably to the need for home defense and adequate preparation against any attempt of invasion by an aggressor nation.

The American Federation of Labor has cooperated and will continue to cooperate with the Federal Government in the formation and execution of its preparedness plans.

I may remark at that point that everyone, no matter what his politics, will so cooperate—

The American Federation of Labor has cooperated and will continue to cooperate with the Federal Government in the formation and execution of its preparedness plans. We have expounded a philosophy which proclaims that loyalty to labor unions presupposes loyalty to our Government. This is both primary and basic. Labor, as represented by the American Federation of Labor, will stand immovable in its defense of our Government, of our democratic institutions, and of the blessings of liberty, freedom, and justice provided for in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States.

Those two cutworn documents still live, Mr. President, in the hearts of some men in this country.

In pledging universal support the men and women of labor accept the assurance of our Government that social, industrial, and economic standards set up and recognized by the Government will be maintained and, in turn, they assume, in full measure, their responsibility for service of the highest order both in industry and for the Nation.

The full use of our material resources and the construction of naval vessels, airplanes, tanks, guns, and war material is but a part of national preparedness. Full realization of any goal set for the production of material to be used in the creation of an adequate national defense would avail nothing unless such achievement would be supplemented by the creation of an army large enough and strong enough to man our defenses and to resist successfully any attempt by any enemy, no matter how large or powerful it might be, to set foot upon our homeland. We are firmly of the opinion that our Government should formulate a plan designed to mobilize adequate manpower for national defense and through the President make known to Congress and the country the manpower need of the Nation. Under such circumstances it is my opinion American labor will support the organization and creation of an army large and strong enough to meet national requirements.

We do not regard the Burke-Wadsworth bill, which provides for compulsory military service, as a well-planned measure. We cannot, therefore, give it our approval and support.

If it becomes apparent that legislation providing for compulsory military service is necessary such legislation should embody provisions which would adequately protect the economic and industrial status of working men and women. The following stipulations and safeguards should be incorporated therein:

First of all, working men and women whose services may be given to our country should be assured that they will not be called upon individually or collectively to engage in a foreign war or to be sent abroad to become involved in foreign wars.

We negatived that particular averment yesterday, perhaps.

An absolute guaranty should be accorded them that their services would be used only for home defense, for the protection of the Western Hemisphere, our homes, our homeland, and our governmental institutions.

Who cannot agree with that? But some, unfortunately, in the stress of the moment and the jittery character of the emotions which afflict us, have forgotten all the precepts of the fathers of this country and all the traditions which have been handed down to us.

Secondly, the positions of workers must be protected. They should be guaranteed a return to the positions they occupy after they have served the time required for military training as may be required by law.

Thirdly, the compensation allowed, while engaged in military training, should be sufficient to provide for the maintenance of a standard of living approximating that already established for those dependent upon them.

The standard of living is fixed by the bill, for services of the nature which shall be rendered, at $30 or $21 or $31 a month. I have forgotten which.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Twenty-one dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Of course, then, the Congress of the United States has seen to it that they are to be compensated, or to receive a living wage, and a man who has gone to the rescue of his country may rest assured, with the munificent sum of $21 a month, that his loved ones will be fully cared for.

Fourthly, the cost of transportation incurred by those who are a part of the Army and Navy, from their homes to the places where their services are utilized, should be borne by the Government. This should include all industrial workers, skilled, semiskilled, and unskilled who are called upon to serve in war manufacturing industries remotely located from their homes and home communities.

I concede, of course, that that particular provision is complied with amply, fully, and generously by the payment of $21 a month to those who may be conscripted. Let some of us try to live upon that sum.

The American Federation of Labor will give support to compulsory military training service legislation when such action becomes necessary in order to defend, protect, and preserve America.

We are trying to preserve every country on this hemisphere. We are going to preserve and protect every South American country, every Central American country. Of course, we therefore protect America—perhaps.

However, in providing an adequate army for defensive purposes the American way—

What way is that, the American way? We have forgotten the word, all of us. We no longer think in terms of America. We are thinking in terms of some other nation, and we have forgotten the American way.

However, in providing an adequate army for defensive purposes the American way should be followed first. A voluntary enlistment program should be launched by the Government designed to create an army of one million and a half men. This would be putting voluntary action before compulsion.

Just think what a crime it would be to put voluntary action before compulsion. Then, after that he says:

American labor would respond to such a program wholeheartedly and enthusiastically.

I say "amen" to much that is written in this statement of William Green. I am very glad to see that he has come to take the stand he has taken, a stand which a few of us will take and will persist in, notwithstanding we have to do this thing today, and that we have to get through with this bill by 1:30, or 3 minutes after 1, or 4 minutes after 2, that we must have it rammed down our throats after the very brief period of consideration which may be given it. "Amen," say I to Mr. William Green's statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California that the statement be printed in the RECORD?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, in delivering my remarks on the pending bill I wish to proceed without interruption until I conclude. At the conclusion of my remarks I shall be glad to answer any questions which may be propounded. Last Monday I yielded to all interruptions, and it required about 3½ hours to deliver a speech which, if delivered continuously, would have taken about 15 minutes, and I do not want that condition to recur.

Mr. President, the matter of our national defense is so vital, the time elements involved in the establishment of a sound defense so insistent that failure to take the necessary steps in time might result in perilous consequences.

The doctrines and aggressions of certain dictator-controlled nations become every day more menacing toward free and independent democratic countries and the bloody conflicts they have imposed on many of such countries outside the United States, and are still imposing on those they have not already conquered, in a crusade which evidently they do not propose to end until all democracy and freedom shall have been blasted from the earth, call for the immediate establishment by us of a nucleus of armed forces in air, on sea, on land, properly equipped and capable of expansion within adequate time into proportions sufficient to overcome attack on the United States or the Western Hemisphere.

This is the best assurance of the preservation of our liberties and of the liberties of the Western Hemisphere.

This is the strongest and most permanent guaranty against our involvement in any war.

Aside from the existence of present dictatorships and the existing world situation, we need a permanent defense policy to protect us against any aggression and from all war until that day shall come for which we most fervently pray when "the blast of war's great organ shall no longer shake the skies."

Here let us examine our present defense requirements. We cannot draw a line around the sea and land frontiers of continental United States, as it was attempted to do during our consideration of the bill which preceded this, and say that this alone is what we will defend.

The Panama Canal, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Alaska are vital links in our defense chain. These areas are often referred to as outposts. This is in error. Outposts are usually considered as warning or delaying forces to be withdrawn when they have accomplished their mission, or when they are overwhelmed, or when their position shall have become untenable.

There can be no withdrawal from Panama, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, or Alaska without vital disaster to the Nation. To permit these strategical areas to fall into the hands of any enemy would jeopardize the security of continental United States itself.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have asked not to be interrupted during the course of my remarks. I shall be glad to answer the Senator when I shall have concluded.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator. I shall be glad to defer my request until later.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall be glad to answer any questions I can at the close of my remarks.

Moreover, if there is one policy involving a foreign angle to which the American people subscribe, it is embodied in the doctrine that the western world belongs to the western nations.

A violation of this policy by invasion from Europe, which is prohibited by our Monroe Doctrine, would probably not occur as a sudden overt act. It could easily take the form of a step-by-step movement, or of the continuance of a peaceful penetration by foreign nationals of some of our western nations, until definite and powerful minorities would be established, with the result that hostile nations might already have secured a foothold in areas that would threaten the most important link in our national defense—the Panama Canal.

With the Panama Canal out of commission, permanently, or for a prolonged period of time, our Navy as at present constituted would be helpless as the guardian of the oceans, and our present defense system would collapse. It is to be hoped that it will never be necessary to fight to preserve the Monroe Doctrine and the freedom of the Western Hemisphere from aggression and conquest; but if we must fight, prompt action will be imperative. Inability to act promptly would in the end necessitate a long and costly war. But what is more important, the knowledge on the part of invaders that we have the ability to act promptly would be the best form of security against the necessity for action.

It is gratifying to note that along all the necessary channels of action we are taking intensive steps to bring about a proper state of national defense.

One of such steps was the passage yesterday by the Senate of the bill for the training and use of the National Guard and other Reserve components of the Army of the United States.

Another such step is the bill now before us, a bill for the training of a vast citizenship reserve in military science and practice.

This bill does not substitute the compulsory for the volunteer system of enlistment for military purposes.

It combines the compulsory with the volunteer system, because the needed number of men within the necessary time cannot be secured by the volunteer system alone.

To be specific, 400,000 men, the number needed to carry out the plan of our War Department in connection with the first increment by the 1st of October, cannot be secured by the volunteer system alone. The situation is such that every day is vital to a proper national defense at the earliest practicable time.

The volunteer system continues to be the system of our Regular Army, because the Regular Army does not need men in the vast numbers required by the proposed training system in so short a time.

The volunteer system continues to be the system of the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Regular Army Reserve, for the same reason.

The compulsory system is added in the present bill to the volunteer system to meet an immediate emergency in which the time element is a tragic necessity and because the volunteer system cannot obtain the necessary numbers within the time needed in the Nation's defense.

We want to start 400,000 men in training in October, 400,000 in April, and additional increments from time to time of a size demanded by what may be an increasing emergency each year or a lessening emergency until the bill ceases to operate in 1945, unless Congress should extend it.

Why should not a combination of systems be used to insure the result desired?

When the bill ceases to operate, the compulsory phase of enlistment ceases also to operate.

The volunteer system continues as the permanent peacetime policy.

Mr. President, I now desire to analyze the pending bill.

CRITICAL ANALYSIS OF S. 4164, AS AMENDED

Subsections (a) and (b) of section 1 declare the reasons for the measure and express the need for increasing and training the armed forces under a system of selective compulsory military training and service combined with the voluntary system.

Subsection (c) expresses as a statement of policy the intention that the National Guard be not relegated to a status inferior to that which it now holds, and that it be not replaced or demoted by use of the other reserve elements.

Section 2 provides for the registration of all male citizens of the United States, wherever residing, and of all male aliens residing in the United States, within the 21- to 31-year age group, under regulations prescribed in accordance with the bill.

Although large numbers of men are subject to registration and are liable for military training and service, only comparatively few of those registered will actually be selected and inducted for military training and service. The numbers to be so selected and inducted will depend upon the requirements of the War and Navy Departments. In other words, many are registered and are liable for service, but comparatively few will actually be inducted.

Under this bill about 12,000,000 men will be registered. Of this number, the number actually inducted for training during the 5 years of the bill's operation will finally be determined by Congress through its power of appropriation. It is planned to submit to Congress estimates for the induction of 400,000 trainees this fall and 400,000 next spring. Further plans have not been perfected.

Section 3 (a) creates liability for training and service in the land and naval forces on the part of male citizens, wherever residing, and male declarant aliens, within the 21- to 31-year age group, other than citizens and aliens excepted from registration.

Those who are liable for service will be classified, depending upon their degree of availability for military service; but all, regardless of their classification, will continue to be liable for military service. The classification will be made by local boards composed of civilians, who will be neighbors of the men to be classified.

It is deemed advisable to have all male aliens, though not liable for training and service, registered and classified so as to obtain information essential for the most efficient operation of the system—such as, for example, information as to the particular type of jobs they are engaged in and fitted for. In this connection, it is important to ascertain the available source of the various types of skilled workers, so as to determine in what proportion the skilled workers are available for the various armed forces and necessary industries. It is important to note that the bill does not provide for the selection and induction of men for industry or agriculture, as some opponents might have people believe. It is solely a bill for the procurement of men for military functions in the armed forces. Certain men are not primarily taken for the armed forces for the reason that they should be left at home to follow their jobs, which at the time are thought to include necessary functions for fostering defense preparedness.

Section 3 (a) also confers upon the President the power to select and induct whatever number of men he may desire, whether or not war exists, provided that the President must select and induct in accordance with the other provisions of the bill.

One of such other provisions of the bill limiting this power is section 6, which gives Congress full control over the numbers of men to be inducted. Section 6 definitely prohibits the induction of men without the appropriation by Congress of funds specifically for that purpose. This places a definite limitation on the power of the President, and affords control by Congress over the number of men to be inducted from time to time. It is inconceivable that Congress will desire to have inducted more men than will be absolutely necessary; and Congress will be the final judge, through its power of appropriation, of the number necessary.

Section 3 (a) further confers on persons subject to registration—and, in addition thereto, men between 18 and 21 and between 31 and 35—the right to enlist as trainees, as distinguished from the right to enlist in the regular forces, as provided by section 11 (d).

It is believed that voluntary enlistment permitted simultaneously with compulsory selection will not, if properly controlled, interfere with or change the ultimate democratic, impartial, and speedy results which compulsory selection would attain by itself. It is believed that a system of voluntary enlistment operating alone, and without a system of compulsory selection operating simultaneously with it, would fail to produce now, and hereafter as needed, sufficient numbers of qualified men in an impartial, efficient, speedy, and democratic manner. The experiences of past wars show that systems providing for volunteering solely, and without compulsory selection, failed to obtain sufficient numbers of qualified men in sufficient time and in a sufficiently steady, uniform stream. Volunteering did not produce a sufficient volume of men; and even the insufficient volume decreased and ended abruptly. In the war between the States, both sides were forced to adopt compulsory conscription for these reasons. The World War is an outstanding example of the need of the compulsory system of selection. The present experiences of the War and Navy Departments with respect to volunteering, enlistment, and recruiting, indicate that the voluntary system alone will not satisfactorily meet their requirements. Figures and statements presented by representatives of the War and Navy Departments at the hearings before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs confirm this view, and show that this bill, which combines the voluntary and compulsory systems, will meet such requirements impartially and efficiently. It is clear that under a voluntary system operating by itself, and without a compulsory system of selection, the armed forces would, because of the limited numbers of men volunteering, be compelled to admit into service many men having dependents, or needed in war industries, the development of necessary natural resources, or in necessary agriculture.

The bill is based on the traditional principle that every citizen owes a duty to defend the Nation. Under the terms of the bill, the burdens of military service will be borne not only by the willing and by those compelled to volunteer because of lack of funds—as is true under a volunteer system operating alone—but such burdens will be borne equally by all classes, regardless of economic means.

We must not fail to realize that in order to have benefits we must assume some burdens and discomforts. It is high time for us to check up and take stock of our moral fiber and character. We cannot ignore the facts. They must be faced.

The last sentence of section 3 (a) requires that trainees be assigned to camps or units of the land and naval forces of the United States. This is another definite indication that trainees will be inducted solely for military functions, and will not be inducted for industrial functions.

Section 3 (b) provides for a peacetime training period of 12 consecutive months, with a provision for an extension of such period by Congress, should Congress declare the national interest to be imperiled during such 12 months, such extension to end when Congress declares that the national interest so permits. Representatives of the War Department, including General Marshall, recommended a training period of 18 months, and have definitely stated that a 12-month training period is the minimum which would be of any benefit. Congress has control over the length of any extension of the training period, for it is provided that no such extension shall continue until further declaration by the Congress.

Section 3 (b) further provides for the transfer of a trainee after completion of his training period to a trainees' reserve until the act becomes inoperative, or for 10 years or until discharge therefrom, whichever shall occur first in time; and during the time that the trainee shall be in a reserve component he will be subject to such additional training as is now or may hereafter be prescribed by law.

The last portion of section 3 (b) releases a trainee from liability to serve in the reserves in time of peace, provided he shall have had 12 months' training and service in the land forces in time of peace and at least 2 years' satisfactory service in the Regular Army or in the active National Guard. This will enable at least some of those desiring to remain in active service with the Regular Army or with the National Guard to do so, and will likewise be an inducement which will aid in maintaining the authorized strength of the Regular Army and the National Guard.

It is intended that there shall exist and be maintained a reasonably small Regular Army of approximately 375,000 men to be maintained as a permanent nucleus, capable of expansion by utilizing the National Guard and the trainees' reserve in such numbers as may be required by any emergency. The trainees will be trained in groups for periods of 1 year, after which they will be transferred to the trainees' reserve, and will be free to go home to private life and employment, subject to recall as previously stated. Within as reasonable a period of time as possible, there will be available sufficient numbers of men who have served their training period and who have been transferred to the reserves, so that there will be available for purposes of defense and protection of the Nation, should the occasion arise, a vast number of trained reserves not being maintained in the regular armed forces who can spring to arms at a moment's notice. The result will be great elasticity, which will enable rapid expansion, but which will also permit contraction, which is a very important factor overlooked by many.

Section 3 (c) provides that trainees, during their service and training, shall receive the same pay, allowances, and other benefits as are provided by law for enlisted men of like grades and length of service of that component of the land or naval forces to which they are assigned, and after transfer to a reserve component they shall receive the same benefits as are provided for by law in like cases for members of such reserve components. Trainees shall also have an opportunity to qualify for promotion.

The trainees should receive the same pay as men in the regular forces performing the same functions and with whom the trainees are working side by side. Upon being transferred to the reserve, trainees should have the same benefits and obligations as members of other reserve components.

Section 4 (a) requires the selection of men between the ages of 21 to 31, who are liable for training and service, to be made in an impartial manner. Selection in an impartial manner will so be assured for the reason that the selection will be made by local boards composed of civilians who will be neighbors of, or persons known by, the men to be selected. The decentralized administration of this bill by civilians in their respective localities and communities is all-important. Such an administration proved successful under the World War act. Centralized administration by Federal military and naval officers of the compulsory system used in the War between the States gave rise to most unfavorable criticism, brought great disfavor, and attached considerable stigma to the compulsory system. At the time of the World War, such feeling had not as yet been dispelled and was still in evidence. However, by modifying the system and providing for decentralized civilian administration, with the local boards taking the most important part, the system gained great popularity, and disfavor and stigma in connection therewith were for the most part completely and definitely removed. Of approximately 200,000 persons required to administer the World War act, only approximately 195 were officers of the armed forces, and they were merely used for purposes of necessary coordination, direction, and instruction. All the others were civilians, the vast majority of whom were operating in their local communities. The same sort of administration is contemplated under this bill.

Section 4 (b) establishes the method of determining the quotas of men selected and volunteering for training from the 21- to 31-year age group for each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia, and their respective subdivisions. Quotas are determined on the basis of the actual number of men at any specified time who are in the 21- to 31-year-age group and who are liable for training and service but who are not deferred after being classified. The words "who are liable for such training and service, but who are not deferred after classification" are a further indication that liability continues regardless of deferment.

Quotas will be based upon the number of men who are liable for military training and service, but who have not been placed in a deferred class after being classified. World War experience demonstrated the unfairness of basing quotas according to the total male population or even according to all of the men liable for military training and service, including those classified into deferred classes. The unfairness resulted from the fact that some States and localities were discovered to have either great numbers of nondeclarant aliens or others in deferred classes, whereas other States and localities had very few. In other words, it was ascertained that there was an unequal distribution of those classified in deferred classes. When such unfairness was recognized it was decided to base quotas on the number of men in the first class, or, in other words, upon the number of men liable for military service but not deferred.

A quota is that number of men which the Army and Navy Departments will need as of a certain time. For instance, if a national quota of approximately 400,000 men is fixed for October 1, 1940, a particular State's quota will be the fractional portion of that number determined by using for the numerator the total number of men in the State classified into the first class who are liable but not deferred; and for the denominator, the total number of men in the United States classified into the first class who are liable but not deferred.

Section 5 (a) excepts men in the land and naval forces, including Reserve components thereof, from registration; for, if they are already in the service, there is no need to register or classify them. Cadets of the advanced course, senior division, R. O. T. C., are also excepted from registration so as to permit them to complete the course and enter the Reserve components. If any student should drop from the course or finish the course without going into a Reserve component, he would forthwith be required to register under the provision of this act, that there shall be no exceptions from registration after the cause therefor ceases to exist. The section also excepts from registration noncitizen and nondeclarant consular representatives.

Section 5 (a) also provides that a man who is excepted from registration and who has or will have satisfactorily served 3 years in the Regular Army or for 6 years in the Officers' Reserve Corps on the eligible list, or 6 years in the active National Guard will be excepted from registration and further duty in the Reserve components of the United States in time of peace. The section also provides that a man who satisfactorily serves as a member of the National Guard of the United States in active Federal service for a period of 1 year and who thereafter completes not less than 2 years' satisfactory service in the Regular Army or in the active National Guard shall be relieved from further liability to serve in the Reserves in time of peace. This provision supplements the last part of section 3 (b), which provides for excepting trainees from service in the Reserves but not from registration. This wording of section 5 (a) has to do with men in the Regular Army or the active National Guard and does not have to do with trainees who are covered by the last portion of section 3 (b).

The wording of section 5 (b) corresponds with the wording of the World War Act and provides for deferment from selection and induction of the Vice President of the United States; officers—legislative, executive, and judicial—of the United States, the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, while holding office.

Section 5 (c) authorizes the President to defer selection and induction of men working and needed in industries, agriculture, or other occupations for the purpose of maintaining national health, safety, or interest.

It also authorizes the President to defer selection and induction of men with dependents and men physically, mentally, or morally deficient.

The section requires deferment of regular or duly ordained ministers of religion engaged in the regular discharge of their ministerial duties.

The section requires, except with respect to regular or duly ordained ministers, deferment on an individual basis and not on a hit-or-miss or inequitable blanket deferment basis, such as by occupational groups, without regard to the status of the particular individual therein or the necessity for his particular deferment. In other words, it is recognized that a man should not be deferred merely because he is working in a necessary war industry. Such a man should only be deferred if he cannot immediately be replaced by somebody in a deferred class or by a person not subject to the bill. The length of any such deferment must, of course, depend on the length of time required to replace such men. By prohibiting blanket occupational deferments there will be no chance unjustly to escape military training and service.

The last sentence of section 5 (c) states that the deferment shall not continue after the cause therefor ceases to exist. As an example of the operation of this provision, a man placed in a deferred class by reason of being physically deficient and whose deficiency in that respect is subsequently removed will be reclassified immediately upon the removal thereof.

Section 5 (d) provides for relieving conscientious objectors from combatant training or service. Those claiming to be conscientious objectors will be listed on a register of conscientious objectors, and thereafter will be referred to the Department of Justice for inquiry and hearing. If the Department shall find that the particular objector is, by reason of religious training and belief, conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form, it will recommend that such objector be assigned to noncombatant service or to work of national importance. If, however, the Department shall find the particular objector not to be a conscientious objector in good faith, it shall so notify the local board, and the objector's name shall be forthwith removed from the register of conscientious objectors, and such objector shall continue to be liable for combatant training and service as provided in the bill. Either the objector or the local board may question the findings of the Department of Justice, in which event the particular case will be submitted to the Selective Service Appeal Board having jurisdiction for final determination.

Section 6 leaves with Congress full control over the numbers of persons who may be selected and inducted for military service, for it specifically prohibits selection and induction of men for military training and service until Congress shall hereafter appropriate funds specifically for such purpose. It is quite evident and elementary that Congress will enact legislation permitting selection and induction for military training only of those numbers of men whose training and service in the military forces is absolutely necessary for the defense and protection of the Nation.

Section 7 contains substantially the wording of the World War Act, and is deemed essential; for it prohibits payment of bounties to induce enlistment, and it also prohibits a man from furnishing a substitute or making payment in order to escape selection and induction. Similar prohibitions were not included in the compulsory systems established during the War between the States; and, as a consequence, great injustices were done by way of bounties and by way of substituting or buying one's way out of military service. Based upon the unfortunate experiences from such injustices, there was inserted into the World War Act a section similar to section 7.

Section 8 attempts to offer a trainee or Reserve officer on active duty as much protection with respect to reemployment and retention of employment benefits as is within reasonable bounds. It attempts to prevent loss of seniority, accrued employment benefits, including participation in insurance, pension, bonus, and other beneficial programs.

Section 8 (g) provides that the Chief of Finance, United States Army, shall act as the fiscal and disbursing and accounting agent of the director of selective service in carrying out the provisions of the act. This will avoid the expense of setting up and maintaining a separate disbursement and accounting system.

Section 9 contains the penalty provisions of the bill, which are substantially the same as those of the World War act. Experience with the World War provisions shows that they worked satisfactorily in providing the necessary protection.

Punishment by imprisonment for not more than 5 years or a fine of not more than $10,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, is provided in the event of conviction in the district court of the United States. Provision is also made for punishment by court martial of convicted violators who are subject to military or naval law.

Section 10 (a) confers upon the President authority to carry out the provisions of the act.

Section 10 (a) (1) authorizes the President to prescribe the necessary rules and regulations to carry the act into effect.

Section 10 (a) (2) provides for the creation and establishing of a selective and volunteer service system providing for classification of registered men and for establishing local boards, appeal boards, agencies of appeal, and other agencies deemed necessary to make the provisions of the act effective.

The system contemplates the classification of men within the age group into four classes "on the basis of availability for service and training," as provided in section 10 (a) (2). The respective classes represent decreasing degrees of availability, commencing with the first class, but men in all classes continue to be available for training and service in varying degrees, and continue to be liable therefor. In other words, the men in the first class are not the only ones liable or available for training and service but they are merely more readily available than are those in the other classes whose selection and induction are deferred. The volunteer waives all classifications.

Section 10 (a) (3) fixes the salary of the director of selective service at not in excess of $10,000, and requires confirmation by the Senate of his appointment, and of the appointment of all persons under the director whose salaries are in excess of $5,000 per annum.

Section 10 (a) (4) provides authority for the use of Federal and State services, information, facilities, and personnel.

Section 10 (a) (5) authorizes printing, binding, and blank-book work, and the obtaining of office equipment.

Section 10 (a) (6) relates to parcles for violators of the act.

Section 10 (b) authorizes delegation of authority by the President. This authority is deemed necessary in order that the director of selective service may conduct the administration of this act efficiently and without unnecessary red tape and delays.

Section 10 (c) provides that decisions of local boards shall be final, except when appeals are authorized. Section 10 (c) also contains a provision for acceptance of voluntary services. This provision was added so as to be able to curtail expenses should any of the civilian personnel desire to perform their services gratuitously.

Section 10 (c) also authorizes use of official penalty envelopes for necessary correspondence.

Section 11 (a) provides that publication by the President of a proclamation or other public notice requiring registration shall constitute notice of the requirements of the act.

Section 11 (b) provides for liberal and reasonable construction of the act.

Section 11 (c) is a customary provision protecting other provisions of the act in the event any provision be held invalid.

Section 11 (d) expressly protects existing laws authorizing voluntary enlistment or reenlistment in the regular armed forces and the reserve components thereof.

Section 12 (a) provides that the words "between the ages of 21 and 31" shall refer to persons who have reached their twenty-first birthday and who have not reached their thirty-first birthday.

Section 12 (b) defines the words "United States" as including the several States, the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the possessions of the United States, except the Philippine Islands, when used geographically.

Section 13 (a) is a customary provision suspending existing laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of the act.

Section 13 (b) provides that the act shall become inoperative and shall terminate on May 15, 1945, unless continued in effect by further act of Congress and except as to offenses committed prior to such date.

Section 14 provides for citing the act as the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940.

Under this bill no large Regular Army is contemplated. The induction is merely for a 1-year period, unless extended by Congress. This bill provides the means for commencing the training of men in military capacities for 1-year training periods and is part of our military policy which contemplates a Regular Army of approximately 375,000 trained men, a National Guard of approximately 250,000 trained men, and such number of trained Reserves as may be necessary to supplement the Regular Army and National Guard. In the absence of further action by Congress, trainees will go home to private lives after a 1-year training period, unless at that time they enlist in the Regular Army or the National Guard.

Mr. President, this completes my analysis of the bill, which the Senate Committee on Military Affairs has reported favorably by a vote of 13 to 3. I trust it will receive your approval.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In his able discussion the Senator has referred to the experience of the War and Navy Departments as condemning the efficiency of the voluntary system.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No. They do not do that, except in one respect.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What is that respect?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Where there is a time emergency, and men in especially large numbers are needed within a limited time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator will review his very able statement he will find that he has asserted that the past experience of the War Department justifies their expectation that they cannot get adequate numbers of men in sufficient time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. They cannot get 400,000 men by October under the voluntary system alone.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What I want to know is what there is about the experience of the War and Navy Departments which leads them to believe that they cannot get sufficient numbers of men by the voluntary system.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Their actual experience.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What is their experience?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Their actual experience has been that the largest number they ever obtained under the voluntary system, exercising every expedient of which they could think, was about 30,000 in 1 month, an all-time record.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me ask the Senator whether it is not true that the War and Navy Departments have filled the volunteer quota they have asked for this year.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; but the same time element was not involved that is involved in the present case. It is only the present situation that makes the time element important.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If they do not get their full quota, it is because they do not fix their quota big enough.

Mr. SHEPPARD. With the voluntary system for large quotas they would not get them in a limited time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. How does the Senator know that is true if it has not been tried?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have been reliably advised as to the largest number the Army has secured in 1 month.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I can call the attention of the Senator to innumerable recruiting stations which have declined to receive recruits because the quotas have been filled.

Mr. SHEPPARD. At times that is true, but never were those quotas as large as the contemplated quotas now confronting us in connection with so short a period.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the experience up to date is that every quota attempted has succeeded, why is it assumed that larger quotas automatically will fail?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Because the authorities feel confident that they got the largest number they could get, within certain limits, under their past experience, and Admiral Nimitz, of the Navy Department, said at the hearings on this bill that the voluntary system had not yet failed the Navy in the matter of relatively small numbers of men, but he said that as the Navy increased in numbers he would use this bill like the present one.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I wish to ask the Senator another question regarding the number needed, inasmuch as he now stresses that element.

With a Regular Army of 375,000 men and a National Guard of 250,000, which has now been made available, at least so far as Senate action is concerned, and the other Reserves, who also have been made available, we already have a potential total of 750,000. I heard Mr. Knudsen testify this morning before the Senate Committee on Finance that it will be 1942 before there will be complete equipment for an army of 750,000 men. If it takes until 1942 to equip an army of 750,000 men, and we already have potentially 750,000 men, why is it necessary to resort to extraordinary peacetime methods for additional men?

Mr. SHEPPARD. We have sufficient equipment and supplies for the training of the first increment of trainees.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If we cannot equip the Army, what is the use of having them? The equipment is just as much a limitation as the lack of personnel.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Army has not yet reached 375,000; it is only about 260,000 now; and they are equipping the Army as rapidly as they can; but they do have the equipment and the housing for the first increment of trainees, and that will give them sufficient time to secure housing for the remaining trainees, because they are to come in as increments.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Why do they need them if the only army they can put into completely equipped functioning in 2 years is already potentially in sight?

Mr. SHEPPARD. They do not know what army they will have to put into use. It may be less than 750,000. All they have to do is to provide sufficient equipment for the number presenting themselves for training from time to time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. They know what army they cannot put into use, because they know they cannot equip one beyond 750,000 until after 1942.

Mr. SHEPPARD. By equipment, the Senator means matériel, guns, and things of that kind?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I mean to set an army of 750,000 men in effective combat motion.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The period of this bill extends to 1945.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am probably very inept in presenting my question. I think the Senator fails to understand what I am trying to find out. I am merely seeking information. I do not understand why, if the maximum army that can be handled up to the end of 1942 is 750,000 men, and we have already 750,000 men in sight, at least, it is necessary to have additional men, and particularly why it is necessary to invoke conscription for the first peacetime moment in 150 years in order to do that. Why do we need the additional men?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Because in peacetime we will not have 750,000 men in active service at one time, and if such an emergency should occur that we have to gather men together in larger numbers than we have the equipment or the housing to supply, we will have to do the best we can, as we did during the World War, with temporary housing, and get the equipment in any way we can. In fact, that emergency is upon us and we must go ahead and build up a reserve to meet every demand for such larger numbers, regardless of permanent equipment and permanent housing conditions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me ask the Senator just one further question about another phase of the matter. What is the total civilian staff which will be necessary to administer the conscription law? I am talking about the local draft boards, and so forth. What is the total personnel involved?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I cannot give the Senator the exact figure, but I shall get it for him.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I noticed the Senator referred to 200,000 as involved in the World War effort. I assume it would be at least 200,000 now. Is that correct?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall secure the definite information and give it to the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator tell me how these local draft boards are to be chosen?

Mr. SHEPPARD. They are appointed by the President on the recommendation of the State Governors. The Governors are assisted in this matter and other matters pertaining to the system by State committees composed of National Guard men, Legionnaires, Reserve officers, and other citizens.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is there any provision in the bill governing the establishment of these local boards, I mean as to the methods by which they shall be established?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That will be done by regulation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is not in the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is not in the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to ask the Senator a question following the interrogation of the Senator from Michigan. We have provided for a maximum Regular Army of 375,000 men. Of course, if we bring in the National Guard and the Reserve officers, and all of them come in or are called in, we get up to around 700,000. Of the 375,000 men authorized as the maximum of the Regular Army, the Senator says there are about 260,000 now in the Army who have been accepted for service.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The present enlisted strength of the Regular Army is in that neighborhood.

Mr. TAFT. I noticed a statement this morning that there were 270,000 now enlisted, today, in the Regular Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It may have gotten to that figure. When I last saw the figure, it was 260,000. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. A day or so ago, in a statement the Senator from Texas made on the National Guard bill, I think he informed the Senate that under the provisions for an increase in the Regular Army, the net increase being taken in now amounts to about 16,000 a month.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That was the case a short time ago.

Mr. ADAMS. It is something over 20,000 now.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes, 20,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. If it is 20,000, and there are now 260,000 or 270,000, which would leave more than a hundred thousand still to be brought into the Regular Army, at that rate it would take 4 or 5 months to fill up the increments necessary to make the Regular Army 375,000.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Perhaps more than that.

Mr. WHEELER. They are asking for forty-some thousand in August.

Mr. BARKLEY. They are taking in these additional men necessary to provide for a maximum of 375,000, as they are enlisting and are weeding out, so as to get those qualified, and I expect also the question of facilities and equipment has something to do with the number accepted.

Mr. SHEPPARD. A certain number drop out. The net gain is never what the gross enlistment is. Sometimes it is five or six thousand under, or more.

Mr. BARKLEY. Sometimes enlistments expire, so that we have to subtract the number of those who go out and do not reenlist.

Mr. ADAMS. Permit me to interrupt, because we have had some figures before the Committee on Appropriations the last few days. The net gain is a little over 20,000 a month.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who has the floor?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Texas has the floor, and I have been proceeding on the theory that the Senator from Texas had the floor.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have the floor, and I have yielded to the Senator from Kentucky; and I yield to him to yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am glad vicariously to yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Just a few days ago General Marshall testified as to the enlistments in June. In June there were enlisted as volunteers 22,947. The result of that was a net gain of 16,000. In other words, the difference between 22,000 and 16,000 were those who dropped out.

Also, in connection with the question raised by the Senator from Michigan, who said there were some recruiting stations which were not taking them, the general made a statement which had reference to that. I read from the record of the hearings before the committee at page 11:

> Senator AUSTIN. Yes. I ascertained you were then only taking the replacements.
> General MARSHALL. Yes. In June I started the recruiting, before I got the appropriation. I gambled, very frankly. And I had to watch and see that we cut off this recruiting before I was involved in a financial dilemma, but the situation was so serious that, fortunately, congressional action and the retroactive effect of the 1941 Budget saved me from being investigated by the Congress.

Mr. WHEELER rose.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to complete my question.

Mr. WHEELER. If I may interrupt, General Marshall——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules of the Senate require that when a Senator desires to interrupt, the Chair be addressed, and that the Senator having the floor state whether he will yield or not.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator has already said he would yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear it. Very well.

Mr. WHEELER. General Marshall was speaking of the Army; but likewise, as I understand, the marines and the Navy are enlisting men. So what the Senator is giving to us is just the figures as to the Army, and not as to the whole armed forces of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Michigan has referred to the testimony of Mr. Knudsen before the Committee on Finance, which, I am sorry, I did not hear; but I had another appointment and could not go to the meeting of the Committee on Finance.

I do not know how far the suggestion he made was explored, and whether he meant to refer to 750,000 men as the 750,000 men who are made up of the Regular Army and the National Guard and these Reserves that the measure we passed yesterday will call out, or whether he was talking about 750,000 men under a selective military training system provided for in the pending bill. But it is my understanding that the plan is to call these 400,000 the 1st of October and then probably the 1st of January to call out another 400,000 men.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The 1st of April.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is proposed on the 1st of April to call out another 400,000 men, making 800,000. Those men are to be trained for a year. So it would be 1942 before the second contingent of 400,000 men are trained to become a part of any 750,000 men who may have been in the mind of

Mr. Knudsen when he testified on that subject. So with the third contingent, which would make the number 1,200,000 men in all, if a total of that many are called in the various contingents, it would be well into 1942, and probably toward the end of 1942, before the training was completed. Of course, the trainees would have to have a certain amount of equipment while they were being trained, but training does not require the same equipment per man that is required for the Regular Army, or certainly for an army which expects to engage in warfare. Is that correct?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield the floor.

Mr. McNARY. I was going to propound an inquiry. The able Senator from Texas in his address stated that the bill combines the voluntary and the compulsory system. That statement, standing by itself, did not mean a great deal to me. I should like to have the Senator amplify that statement and point out wherein that proposition can be found in the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In section 3.

Mr. McNARY. How does it work? The Senator is familiar with it. How, in the bill, is the voluntary system combined with the compulsory system? I thought the philosophy of the bill was that of a compulsory system.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not at all.

Mr. McNARY. I have not had the opportunity of hearing the witnesses nor have I obtained the information from members of the committee. For my sake alone I should like to have the Senator explain more in detail the dual aspects of this bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. When the men are registered they are asked to indicate whether they want to volunteer, and they are allowed to do so if they desire to volunteer. Not only that, but the draft phase of the bill applies only to those between 21 and 31 years of age, whereas anyone from 18 to 35 may volunteer, according to the terms of the measure.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask him a question on that point?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator says men are given permission to state whether they volunteer?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; they are asked whether they do so.

Mr. NORRIS. They are asked?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought that would be the same thing.

Mr. SHEPPARD. They are asked whether they are volunteers.

Mr. NORRIS. After they are called into the service?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No, indeed.

Mr. NORRIS. Or when they are called? When are they asked that question?

Mr. SHEPPARD. They are asked that when they are classified after registration.

Mr. NORRIS. If they volunteer, they are taken in.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief analysis of this bill, comparing it with the bill which I have introduced on the same subject, and comparing it with the original Burke-Wadsworth bill, the language of which was quite different.

I think I have heretofore made clear my conviction that this terrible war has taught us one lesson, if it has not taught us any other, and that is that modern armies cannot be created after a war has been begun. The experience which I have had has impressed me with the fact that a soldier must be a man of many special skills. I think that is widely appreciated. We know he has to be a radioman, an electric welder, a machine gunner, an armorer, and be familiar with a whole host of special occupations. Equally important is the fact of his training and his coordination with others. In other words, we are not simply trying to develop numbers of men who are good soloists with the machine gun or with the tank, or whatever the weapon may be. We are trying to get men who understand the roles which those various weapons have to play, the lack of which was one of the things which was of such tremendous weakness, I am advised——

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I should like to make my statement as a connected coherent statement, and I think it would be simpler for the Senate to have it set forth in that way, and then I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator give me an idea of about how long he thinks it will take him to expound his views?

Mr. LODGE. I never make a long speech, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. DANAHER. No; but would the Senator give me an estimate of his contemplated time?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know. It all depends on the interruptions. I do not think I have spoken longer than 20 minutes on any occasion since I have been in the Senate.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me say to the Senator that whatever time the Senator takes is always well worth while. He is most instructive.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. But let me say further, Mr. President, that, while the explanation made by the Senator from Texas is in our minds, and before we undertake a comparative analysis of the original so-called Burke-Wadsworth bill and the bill which has been offered as a substitute by the Senator from Massachusetts, which, by the way, has a very great deal of merit in it, it would seem to me that we could much better understand and appreciate the Senator's analysis if we could clear up some of the points that are doubtful, perhaps, in the minds of more than merely myself, with reference to what the Senator from Texas has told us. With that thought in mind, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he will yield, so that I may be permitted to ask the Senator from Texas a few questions; but if the Senator from Massachusetts would prefer to add not only to the confusion that exists in my mind with reference to the bill as explained by the Senator from Texas, but also the confusion that arose originally from the Burke-Wadsworth bill, by a discussion of the substitutes that have been proffered, including the Senator's own, then all right. I, of course, thank the Senator for permitting this much leeway.

Mr. LODGE. I think I shall be able to clear up some of those doubts, I will say to the Senator from Connecticut; and, with his permission, I shall try to do so. In any event, I shall not take very long. I appreciate the point the Senator has in mind, but I will try to come to it at the proper time. I simply wanted to say that it is not solely a question of training men in special skills. It is a question of training them in coordination and working together.

One of the troubles which, I think, the British Army had during the Flanders campaign was that there was practically no coordination between the ground troops and the elements that were in the air. In the case of the German Army, the commander of a battalion of tanks could get aviation bombardment at whatever place he wanted it, with the direct-voice telephone system. They had that degree of coordination. Senators can readily see that such coordination amounts to more than the sum total of the individual skills of groups of tank soldiers or aviators; and that is one of the things training develops. In training that type of coordination or teamwork it is not essential, although it is desirable, to have all the weapons and equipment on hand.

The nucleus of the present German Army trained with make-believe tanks made of canvas, and they trained their antiaircraft gunners with little .22 guns and small toy airplanes.

One of the reasons I have been so much opposed to sending our military equipment abroad is because here in the United States it is worth so much more than it would be abroad.

Our 400 tanks, which would disappear in a day under the conditions which obtained in Europe in the Battle of Flanders, are worth 1,500 or 2,000 tanks, because numbers of different men can be trained in the same tanks. That is the point I wanted to bring out.

I have therefore, Mr. President, long favored some form of obligatory service, and it seemed to me that our national-defense policy, which assumed that we could declare war on a certain day and then wait 6 months to get ready for it, was not only an obsolete policy but was almost suicidal.

It may very well be that this country will not be attacked, and I hope it will not, and I am rather inclined to believe that it will not; but I have simply felt that those of us who are in a position of responsibility have got to assume the worst, and then if the worst does not happen, so much the better. People may think of us as being unduly alarmed and that we hear noises under the bed, but so far as the security of the country is concerned it seems to me that our proper duty is to assume the worst and prepare for it, and then perhaps it will not happen.

Mr. President, although I am sympathetic with and favor the idea of some obligatory service, I am likewise extremely critical of many provisions of the Burke-Wadsworth bill as it was first introduced and presented to the Senate, and I should like to list some of the features of that bill which are not in the legislation which now confronts the Senate.

First, the original bill stated in its preamble that every able-bodied man was to be placed under a system of compulsory military service. This was obviously unnecessary and impossible, inasmuch as neither the weapons nor the housing facilities exist to accommodate more than a small fraction of the able-bodied men in the country. Such a scheme would also have completely dislocated, if not destroyed, our normal civilization—something which, of course, should be resisted not only for its own sake and for the sake of preserving civil liberties but for military reasons as well.

Second, the bill called for the registration of every man between the ages of 18 and 65, a total of about 42,000,000 men. This would have caused a possible crucial delay, which could have been justified only on the ground that time was not vitally important. Together with the preamble, this provision brought up the whole picture of 1917—a picture of a huge army to be trained with considerable delay and without sufficient weapons. In 1917 this was a good method, because we had the time and Great Britain and France stood ready to provide us with weapons. However, in 1917 we were at war. In 1940, although we are now in an abnormal and perhaps perilous situation, we are at peace.

Third, the Burke-Wadsworth bill contained no limit of any kind on the total number of men to be raised. This gave the impression that a virtually unlimited grant of power was requested. Actually, of course, the appropriation bills will and must limit the size of the Army. The Army itself must set limits if it is to be able to make intelligent plans; and, of course, the Army has done so. I am told that it plans to induct into the service about 350,000 or 400,000 men in the autumn, and another similar number to take their places next year. Why the bill did not give to the people the assurance which a definite limit would convey is hard to grasp, because if the bill were limited as to the number of men to be raised, the number would figure out to about 1 man in every 3,000 of population, which is not a very high percentage. I plan later to offer an amendment on this point.

Fourth, the original bill, by taking in so much territory and asking for so many unlimited grants of power, naturally caused the suspicion to arise that social and internal changes were in contemplation which had little real value to national defense.

Fifth, it stated in the preamble that the burdens of military service would be "shared by all"—a laudable sentiment which was effectively contradicted by the language of section 5 of the bill, which stated that "not more than 87 percent nor less than 78 percent of the men selected shall be between the ages of 21 and 31."

This last provision illustrates the hard, practical fact which centuries of military history have proved—that the brunt of war falls on young men. This must inevitably be so, because, as a general rule, young men alone possess the stamina and ability to recover quickly from physical hardships, which quality is essential to a soldier. Under those circumstances it served no good purpose to foster the belief that the burdens of military service would be equally borne. They never have been.

Sixth, the bill contained a provision exempting public officials, which, while of comparatively slight importance numerically, is significant, I think, from the standpoint of morale. Not many public officials are of the requisite age to be subject to service; but should not those who are able to render military service set the example by so doing?

Seventh, the bill contained provisions for organizing home-defense units. This is something for which the War Department is not organized. It is the special province of the States, which have the knowledge of personnel and of conditions necessary to do a satisfactory job.

Eighth, the bill contained provisions for reducing the pay of soldiers to mere cigarette money, something which no one who desired to build up an army of highly selected personnel would advocate, and something which would be justified only in a mass army following an acute financial crisis.

Ninth, the bill contained no method whereby the volunteer system would have a chance to show what it could do.

Tenth, the bill took neither a long-term view nor a short-term view, being too cumbersome for an emergency and not a proper bill for a long-term military training policy. Such a bill—a long-term bill—should, of course, seek to train boys only when they reach a given age.

Eleventh, and finally, the original bill appeared to rest on the assumption that we were certain to enter a war in the near future, which war would be similar in its personnel requirements to the World War.

That, Mr. President, is my criticism of the Burke-Wadsworth bill. The bill which I introduced was frankly an emergency bill, which sought to achieve manpower in a hurry. The registration was confined to a small class of men, between the ages of 21 and 25, an age from which the best soldiers are recruited, and at which few men have made as important commitments as they make a few years later. Moreover, it is also an age which would keep men in the reserve for the longest possible period, which is a point worth considering.

Secondly, my bill sought to raise men for the Regular Army, so that it would be at all times up to a strength of 750,000. That is the figure to which the weapon program is adjusted. As I have said, inasmuch as the Regular Army already stands at 375,000, or it is planned to stand at that figure, this would have required about 400,000 to be raised by conscription, or about 1 in every 3,000 of population.

My bill was a simple defense bill. No social upheavals or any kind of major changes were possible under its terms. It envisioned a "highly selected personnel" for a larger army than we now have, but not a mass army, with its inevitable complement of men of doubtful military value. It recognized the fact that the brunt of war always falls on young men. It contained no exemption for public officials. It had no provision for home-defense units and no provision for reducing the soldiers' pay. It took a frankly short-term view, aiming to build up the Army in the promptest possible way. It rested on the assumption—which is necessarily different from the assumption of the original Burke-Wadsworth bill—that while we are in an abnormal and possibly perilous situation, we are not at war. It assumed that a sufficiently impressive show of force might keep war away from us completely. Finally, it rested on the assumption that the personnel requirements of war today are drastically different from those of the World War.

We now come to the committee bill. The committee bill has eliminated the following items, which were in the original Burke-Wadsworth bill:

The provision that "every able-bodied man" shall come under the system.

The provision for a 42,000,000 registration.

The statement that military service would be "shared by all."

The provision that young men share 78 to 87 percent of it.

The provision for home defense.

The provision for reducing soldiers' pay.

The committee bill has added the following items:

A provision to facilitate men recovering their jobs after their military service is completed.

A provision to give the volunteer system a chance to operate by—

(A) Reducing the volunteer enlistment period from 3 years to 1.

(B) Giving credit to a State or subdivision for the number of volunteers, said number to be deducted from their conscription quota.

My understanding of that provision—and I hope the Senator from Texas will correct me if I am mistaken—is that if a certain county has a quota of 5,000 men to be raised by selective service, and 5,000 men proceed to enlist voluntarily, then no men will have to be drafted from that county. Is that correct?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. LODGE. That is my understanding of it.

I have always been friendly to the volunteer system, but I have been reluctant to permit such a state of affairs to exist as that the volunteer system would cause a real delay in the procurement of men. The system in the bill enables the volunteer system to have a real chance to show what it can do, but it does not delay the procurement of men.

There is only one difference which I would suggest, and that is that the pay of the soldiers be increased. If we should increase the pay of the soldiers and reduce the enlistment period, I should not be at all surprised if the number of men we might have to draft would be very, very small, indeed, and in many counties there might be no occasion to draft men.

Those are the two points which the committee bill adds—the provision for the recovery of jobs and the provision for the voluntary system.

The committe bill does not touch the question of the exemption of public officials, which, of course, now that the age limit has been reduced, is not a very vital question. I frankly believe that there should be such an exemption, but, of course, with the age limits between 21 and 31 in this particular bill, that is more or less of an academic matter.

Finally the committee bill does not touch the point—and I think it is regrettable that it does not—of the failure to provide a limit to the number of men to be raised. I still cannot understand why that should not be done. The War Department will have to come before the Appropriations Committee, and a limit will be set there. The Army must have its own limit if it is to know how many cantonments to build, how much food to order, and how many pairs of shoes will be required. Why there is a reluctance to put a limit in the bill on the number of men to be raised I am sure I cannot understand, because no single change could be made in the bill which would be more of a reassurance to the American people.

It is true, of course, that the committee bill is, in my opinion, a vast improvement on its original. It is much more limited; it is much more practical; its new title, I think, better describes it, namely:

> A bill to provide for the common defense by increasing the personnel of the armed forces of the United States and providing for its training.

It is immeasurably nearer to the kind of bill for which I have been striving, but I think there should be a limit in it, and at this point, Mr. President, I submit an amendment, which I ask to have lie on the table and which I shall call up at the proper time. The amendment would come in on page 15, line 18. Beginning in line 15 on that page the bill reads:

> The President is authorized, whether or not a state of war exists, to select for training and service in the manner herein provided, and to induct into the land and naval forces of the United States, such number of men—

At that point my amendment would add the words "(not to exceed 800,000)."

I base the figure 800,000 on a statement on page 8 of the committee report, which reads as follows:

> The War Department plans, if this bill is enacted, to induct for military training and service approximately 400,000 men this autumn and about 400,000 in April 1941.

That is the authority for the particular figure proposed by my amendment.

Of course, I think it is clear that the actual increase of strength will not be 800,000, but will be 400,000. As enlistments expire, I think wisely, the Army plans to take in additional men, so that there will be an overlapping period, and recruits will start training before the men who have had their training leave the service.

Mr. President, that concludes my remarks. I have already submitted an amendment, similar to the language in the National Guard bill, which specifically prohibits the sending of any troops under this bill to Europe and confines their service to the Western Hemisphere. I think if the Senate will adopt that amendment and also the amendment limiting the number of men who can be raised under this bill—and that is a limit which exists anyway—the bill will be much improved.

Mr. DANAHER obtained the floor.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator from Delaware, of course.

Mr. HUGHES. I beg the Senator's pardon, and I thank him very much.

In view of the fact that I am receiving, as I presume every other Senator is receiving, a great many letters and postal cards, the writers of which seem to have the impression that the suggestion of the voluntary system has been thrown into the discard and that we are now considering drafting men to make up the Army, I wondered if the Senator from Massachusetts would emphasize in part what he has just said, that such is not the case, but that the bill does provide a plan for the voluntary system and first gives that opportunity?

Mr. LODGE. That is very definitely so. I think this matter has been unfortunately presented in the first instance and a great deal of easily avoidable alarm has been aroused. The original bill, of course, did not have anything about the voluntary system, but under the pending bill, provided we increase the pay of the soldier, I think we will then be doing all that we possibly can for the voluntary system. As this bill now stands, the voluntary system is given a complete opportunity to show what it can do and to such an extent that if 400,000 men will volunteer within the next month or so, then the draft, of course, will not apply at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. KING. I apologize to the Senator.

Mr. DANAHER. Not at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have considered a bill which passed the House unanimously, came to the District of Columbia Committee, and was reported unanimously by that committee to the Senate. It is simply a codification of the fire, marine, and casualty insurance laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, as I understand it is a codification of laws and is not the enactment of any new statutes?

Mr. KING. It is a codification of laws with respect to fire, marine, and casualty insurance. It was handled in the Senate by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], who held hearings. The bill has been reported unanimously, and there is no objection to it. It is desired by the Commissioner of Insurance and by the authorities of the District of Columbia.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, when I yielded to the Senator from Utah with reference to his request that he be permitted to ask for the present consideration of a bill, I did not know what the bill was. I do know that the bill to which he refers has previously been handled by the Senator from Nevada, and there are two or three points with reference to the bill which I wish to discuss with the Senator from Nevada. I respectfully ask the Senator from Utah presently to withhold his request. I think that we can easily adjust what I had in mind by a question or two, and, if so, I will thereafter happily withdraw any objection.

Mr. KING. I withdraw my request.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from Utah.

Mr. President, when I previously remarked about the explanation that was offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] to the pending bill, of course, it must have become apparent that I was interested especially in the bill that is before the Senate rather than in those which are "on order." I desire to invite the attention of the Senator from Texas to one or two points in his explanation which, it seems to me, require elucidation. I refer particularly to his statement that the Congress at all times has within its control how many men are to be taken, the Senator from Texas having pointed to section 6 of the bill as the control feature, namely, the power of Congress to appropriate.

Let me, therefore, calling the Senator's attention to section 6, appearing on page 22, ask him first whether or not the bill which we passed yesterday with reference to calling reserve components has already been provided for financially in the general army appropriation bill for 1940–41.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I cannot answer that question because I do not recall the facts at this time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I can answer it.

Mr. DANAHER. I will be happy to have the Senator from Michigan help me in that particular.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The question was raised this morning in the Senate Finance Committee when estimates for the next fiscal year were presented, and we were shown a prospective deficit of approximately $6,000,000,000, which does not include the cost either of the National Guard bill or the conscript bill, and we were told that there were no available estimates even as to what the cost will be in respect to those bills.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator. As a matter of fact, I did not know, Mr. President, what the facts were in that particular. I am not on the committee handling it, but I suspected that that very situation existed. So long as it exists with reference to the bill which was passed yesterday, let me ask the Senator from Texas, please, how he estimates the cost per man for those who will be taken under the present bill, Senate bill 4164?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have made no estimate.

Mr. DANAHER. Can the Senator from Texas give us from the War Department an estimate of how much the cost per man will be?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will get such an estimate and put it in the RECORD.

Mr. DANAHER. The Senator does not have it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No.

Mr. DANAHER. Then the Senator would answer, I take it, that if we are to draft 400,000 men for duty as of October 1, at the present moment, as we are now undertaking to consider the bill, there is no estimate of what it will cost to take those 400,000 men and induct them into the service? Is that correct?

Mr. SHEPPARD. There is probably an estimate, but I have it not at hand.

Mr. DANAHER. Then, the Senate in considering the bill, if we were to be guided by the element of financial cost, certainly could not rely upon any existing figures either before it now or appearing in the hearings? Is that correct?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Oh, yes; the figure will be supplied in the course of debate. I do not have it at this moment.

Mr. DANAHER. The information was not brought out in the hearings before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, I take it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not recall, but I say the information will be supplied in the course of the debate. I will be glad to give it to the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I gladly yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Further amplifying my previous statement, the Secretary of War stated this morning specifically that he knows that no such information is available in his Department at the present time.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator: Of course those are the things to which I am referring.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. OVERTON. It is my understanding, subject to verification, that the cost will be between $1,100 and $1,200 per man. I think that testimony was given before the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. DANAHER. That is per year, is it not?

Mr. OVERTON. Yes; per year per man. I think that was the testimony given before the Appropriations Committee the other day.

Mr. DANAHER. So we have a bill before us, as I understand, let me say to the Senator from Texas, in which no specific number is provided to be drafted; no specific limitation is placed on the total number ultimately to be drafted, but men will be called for by the Chief of Staff, and the only control that Congress will have over the matter will be through providing or failing to provide appropriations for the cost? Is that correct?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes. And that gives Congress complete control.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, the Senator also in his explanation undertook to outline a formula on the basis of which men are to be conscripted. Inviting his attention to subparagraph (b) of section 4, appearing on page 17 of the bill we find that quotas are to be furnished "on the basis of the actual number of men in the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and the subdivisions thereof, who are liable for such training and service but who are not deferred after classification."

Mr. President, let us assume a case. Take, for instance, a State such as Mississippi, where the Negro citizens outnumber the white citizens; let us assume that the white citizens are actually engaged in and the national interest requires that they continue to be engaged in occupations in furtherance of the national defense or the national interest within the meaning of the pending bill; does that mean that the quota as provided in the bill would take the total number of men between the prescribed ages, defer those who are required to be deferred and not to be subject to conscription, and then draw from the remainder the number who are to be inducted into the service?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill says that the number the Senator last mentioned shall be a basis for the calculation of the quota. The formula which I gave took that number as a basis and divided that number by the total number of men in the United States eligible for service; but I will say to the Senator that he will not find many citizens of Mississippi advancing any excuse for not getting into the service.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I really believe that is wholly true. I believe it is eminently true in the State of Connecticut. Let me also say to the Senator from Texas, however, that when he undertook to explain the formula he most certainly did not follow the language of the bill which is now before us; for very definitely, upon checking his statement in the RECORD, he will find that it does not follow the language of section 4, subparagraph (b).

Mr. SHEPPARD. I again call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the fact that the bill says that that number shall be used as a basis for the calculation.

Mr. DANAHER. When the Senator talks about "basis," I take it that he is using terms literally and is undertaking to have us understand that this measure, if it becomes a law, will be universally and equally applied throughout all the States. Is not that so?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true; and the formula which has been worked out in the Department applies the same basis in the same way to every State in the Union.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me say to the Senator from Texas that the language of the bill says that those conscripted are to be taken on the basis of the actual number of men. It does not say on the basis of those available for service, does it? It says the actual number of men.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; on the basis of the actual number of men in class I who are available for service; that is, all those not deferred.

Mr. DANAHER. That is the Senator's explanation, that the entire thing—the numerator, as he described it—will be based on class I men who are available for service?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is correct.

Mr. DANAHER. Without any deferments of any kind?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Without the deferments.

Mr. DANAHER. That is correct. I was restating the matter in my own language to make certain that the RECORD showed an understanding on my part of the Senator's explanation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator for that. I appreciate it.

Mr. President, the Senator also told us that there is an immediate emergency which creates a tragic necessity for conscription of American youth in this measure. Will the Senator tell us whether or not there was any evidence before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs of the nature of the immediate emergency?

Mr. SHEPPARD. We did not need any evidence except what is known to everybody. I think everybody in the United States knows what is going on. It is this onslaught of dictatorial powers against democracy throughout the world. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must admonish the occupants of the galleries that they are not to indicate, by word or applause of any kind, agreement with or dissent from what is said in the Senate.

The occupants of the galleries will please preserve order; and the men in charge of the galleries will see that there is no further applause.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, the Senator's sentiment, as he expressed it in his reply, I am certain is the sentiment of everyone in this body; but, Mr. President, technically and specifically, I wish to know whether the emergency is immediate, contemplating that the American Fleet will have been destroyed before anyone attempts to invade our hemisphere or to endanger our national interest.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Whether or not the fleet is destroyed, right now, Germany has announced her claim to the islands adjacent to the United States because France owned them.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, is the Senator from Texas correct in that statement?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; Germany has announced a claim.

Mr. TAFT. Can the Senator show any statement in which Germany has claimed the island of Martinique?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think I can.

Mr. TAFT. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think not.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HOLMAN. I can assure the Senator that from authoritative military sources I have learned of the peril of invasion of Alaska from the Pacific, which would endanger the entire Pacific slope.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from Oregon for his contribution.

Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Texas whether or not there has been any evidence of how many men it would take to effect a beach head, a landing, in the event that the United States Navy were attempting to repel invasion.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is not necessary to say how many men it will take. If they get a base near our country which can be upbuilt, our liberty is endangered. Does the Senator say there is not any danger?

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the Senator if he can point out to us any possible source of expected or threatened danger in this hemisphere.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have just told the Senator one source of immediate danger, and that is the seizure by Germany of the islands near us, or of a foothold in South America. I devoted the first portion of my opening address to describing what I considered the emergency.

Mr. DANAHER. Without any facts; and that is what I am after.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I gave the facts.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the Senator from Texas if he understands that this expected invasion will come from Germany or from Italy, or from both.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From Germany, mainly.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the Senator, further, whether or not it is expected that the United States Navy will undertake to repel an attempted invasion.

Mr. SHEPPARD. As best it can. The Navy is needed now in the Pacific Ocean, where an attack is already imminent from Japan. Within the past few days Japan has made assertions, through her military department, that she is about to assert claim to the tin and the rubber in the Dutch East Indies. That might be a very serious injury to the United States if it made those materials inaccessible to us.

Mr. DANAHER. Does the Senator understand, and therefore express to us as one of the reasons for this bill, that the United States Navy must be kept in South Sea Island waters on account of that threat or that claim by Japan?

Mr. SHEPPARD. This bill does not relate to the Navy.

Mr. DANAHER. No; but it relates to facts involving our alleged imminent emergency, and I want to find out from the Senator whether or not he considers that the United States Navy is adequate for our defense.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not.

Mr. DANAHER. Does the Senator think our Navy will be required to be kept in the waters of the South Sea Islands?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am afraid it will have to be kept in the Pacific.

Mr. DANAHER. Then does the Senator understand and believe that we need all the ships we have in our Navy?

Mr. SHEPPARD. We need twice as many as we have.

Mr. DANAHER. We cannot spare even 50, can we? [Manifestations of applause in the galleries].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I do not like to complain, but the Chair has already notified the occupants of the galleries that it is against the rules of the Senate to manifest approval or disapproval of what is said on the floor. We appreciate the presence of our guests in the galleries, but the Senate has made rules for its orderly procedure. It seems to me that our guests in the galleries ought to have enough respect for the United States Senate to observe the rules we have made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hopes it will not be necessary to order the galleries cleared.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator has been discussing with the Senator from Texas the question of invasion. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut, who has the floor and who is making the discussion, whether or not he believes the country is threatened with any invasion in the immediate future, or sometime in the future.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me answer the Senator from Illinois to this effect:

The Senator from Texas in his statement has told us that there is an immediate emergency which presents a tragic necessity for the enactment of this bill. Those are his words and those are his phrases. What he told us, on the basis of the information supplied to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which he is the chairman, was, that no overt act is expected; that no act of invasion is looked for; that, in fact, any possible danger to us will come through the infiltration of large numbers of persons who, through economic and other penetration, achieve a foothold in the South American republics. I think that was the sense of the Senator's comment; was it not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was not.

Mr. DANAHER. Then what was it, please?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was discussing the Monroe Doctrine, and that is just another danger that confronts us—an interference with South America through this infiltration that might call on us to act in defense of that Doctrine. The other dangers I have enumerated are in addition to that.

Mr. DANAHER. Did not the Senator tell us that he did not expect an overt act by way of attack or invasion upon us?

Mr. SHEPPARD. As to the Monroe Doctrine only.

Mr. DANAHER. Then, of course, if anyone should attack any republic in the Western Hemisphere, the Senator would expect that to be construed to be a violation of the Monroe Doctrine; would he not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I would. That would be another form of violation; but I was speaking of another line of action. I did not mean to embrace the entire situation in my discussion of that particular form of action making it necessary for us to invoke the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. DANAHER. I see. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DANAHER. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. DANAHER. I sought to undertake to answer the question by having the Senator from Illinois get my understanding of the explanation submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LUCAS. I understood the Senator from Connecticut in his colloquy with the Senator from Texas to say that he thought the Senator from Texas believed there was some peril to the United States from the standpoint of an invasion. The Senator has the floor, and I should like to have the Senator's opinion as to what he thinks about the question whether or not this country is in danger of an immediate invasion by anyone—Germany, or England, or Japan, or whoever it might be—or whether or not the United States is in danger in any way whatsoever immediately, or will be in danger in the immediate future.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me say to the Senator from Illinois that I am only a Member of the Senate, and I am not advised of what are the facts.

Mr. LUCAS. That is hardly an answer.

Mr. DANAHER. Yes; it is an answer. I can point out to the Senator from Illinois that we have been passing bill after bill, and we have been loosely told that there is an immediate emergency which constitutes a tragic necessity for this and that action, but there is never submitted to us, either in the hearings or otherwise, facts as to the alleged danger, who is threatening us, from what source, or on what account.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator further yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator will correct me if I am mistaken, but I was under the impression that the Senator from Connecticut voted for every appropriation submitted by the administration for national-defense purposes. Is not that correct?

Mr. DANAHER. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. Why did the Senator vote for those appropriations if he was in no fear of what was going to happen to this country in the future?

Mr. DANAHER. The Senator from Connecticut has never said that he was in no fear, or in any fear, or anything about it. Those are words of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. I am trying to ascertain from the Senator what he fears from the standpoint of Europe, or Asia, or any other quarter which led to his votes upon every measure which has included appropriations of billions upon billions of dollars for adequate national defense.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I did not expect to undertake to answer that question today, but I will do so.

Let us go back for a few months, and let us remember that month after month those who had knowledge of the facts, and those who were charged with the conduct of our foreign policy, have been conducting a series of public comments, public expositions of doctrines against nations with whom we are at peace. Let me point out that it has been told to us that our Nation faces a conflagration, that the world faces a conflagration, that we must see that our house is in order. We have been told vicariously that our frontier is on the Rhine, that we must take "measures short of war" to stop aggressors, that we must undertake this, that, and the other means of protecting our welfare. At the same time, corollary to these public declarations, we find a series of steps being taken leading in exactly the opposite direction.

There is not a man in this Chamber who does not know—it was charged last fall definitely and positively as a fact—that there was only one reason for the repeal of the arms embargo in the neutrality act, and that was the desire to assist Great Britain in the present war, and that that was the only purpose of it.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. Not yet. I will answer.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. Not just now. I will yield in due course.

From that time on there has been a series of acts and public declarations, every one being one more step, one new trend, all to an ultimate destination, surely, and inescapably. And now, when we have gone through life, so to speak, making enemies instead of friends, we are called upon to meet an immediate emergency which creates a tragic necessity to draw out of civilian and economic life of this country millions of American youth, who are now to be trained to operate tanks, and dive bombers, and submarines, in order to protect us against this possible danger.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. Not just now. I submit that when we come down to an analysis, when we undertake to get the facts as to the state of our preparedness, and we hear the President on the air tell the waiting Nation that we have 1,700 tanks on hand and on order, when he knows that we have on hand only 450, from Honolulu to Eastport; when he tells us, as Senators heard him tell us, about the state of our alleged defense, at a time when we hear that it will take until 1942 before we can put a fully equipped army of only 750,000 men in the field; and when we who have been appropriating seven or eight billion dollars in the past 6 years, thinking that, of course, we were providing for American defense, find that we have no defense, and are aware of a series of actions which will compel us apparently to defend ourselves; then the very least the Senator from Connecticut or any other right-minded Senator could do would be to vote for the defense appropriations, in a belated effort to make up what those in charge of our defense should have seen was fulfilled in the fullest measure all the time. That, Mr. President, is the answer to the Senator from Illinois. I now yield, if he has anything further to say.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I do not think I have any further questions to ask the Senator from Connecticut. His answer is so vague and uncertain, so filled with ambiguity, that I do not care to ask him further questions. The one I asked was very direct. The Senator from Connecticut was interrogating the Senator from Texas in all good faith, asking him who he thought was going to invade this country, who he thought was going to violate the Monroe Doctrine, and how soon, and when, and where, and all I did was to attempt to get an answer to the same questions from the Senator from Connecticut. If he has no belief that any nation is going to violate the Monroe Doctrine, if he has no notion that this country is in the slightest danger of being invaded, either in the immediate future or at some time in the future, if he thinks there is no danger in this world today from the standpoint of our own safety and security from any other nation anywhere in the universe, it is beyond my comprehension how he or anyone else who has the interest of the taxpayers at heart can day after day and week after week vote for the billions upon billions of dollars which have been voted.

Why have Senators and Members of the House of Representatives taken upon themselves the responsibility in these legislative bodies during the last 60 days of voting for bills for a sound and adequate national defense if there is not some danger somewhere? I have asked several times from what source that danger threatens. Whom do we fear at the present time, if we fear anyone at all? Why is it that almost unanimously in the Senate, one after another, there have been reported and passed measures which seek to appropriate billions of dollars for the purpose of securing our homes and our land and the liberty which was given to us by the founding fathers, and was preserved through blood and tears in the long ago?

Ours is about the last democracy that is left in the world. England today stands with her back to the wall, fighting the last fight in Europe for democracy. Is it England we fear? Is that the fear which leads us to appropriate these billions of dollars? Is it Canada we fear? Is it Czechoslovakia, or Poland? Is it Holland, which was ruthlessly invaded a few weeks ago? I ask that question from the bottom of my heart. The American people want to know why we are appropriating billions upon billions of dollars if there is no one in the world we fear at the present time. Providing a sound and adequate national defense, of course, in line with and in the spirit of the National Defense Act of 1920, was something I admit we should have attended to long ago. But when the Senator from Connecticut takes to task the present administration for failure to provide a sound and adequate national defense during the last 6 or 7 years, he does an injustice to the administration and to his country.

If the Senator from Connecticut had gone out in his campaign in 1938 and had asked the people of his State to send him to the Senate on the theory that he was going to vote $5,000,000,000 by way of appropriations for an adequate national defense, the people of Connecticut would never have sent him to the Senate. The people of Illinois never would have sent the Senator from Illinois to the Senate in 1938 upon that kind of an issue, because Americans are a peace-loving people. We do not want war. We seek only to be left alone, and to lead the life we so desire under the banner of freedom, peace, righteousness, justice, and democracy. But something has happened in this old world during the last few months which has aroused the people of America as they have never been aroused before. Something has happened and that is the something which I am trying to ascertain in this argument. I have undertaken to say that there is only one thing we are appropriating these billions upon billions of dollars for, and that, Mr. President, is to keep the totalitarian germ of Europe from spreading to the free shores of America.

Yes, we left autocracy in Europe about 300 years ago, and by the ever-living God, it shall remain there, insofar as the Senator from Illinois is concerned.

There may be no danger, and the Senator from Connecticut can question the Senator from Texas and other Senators here from now until doomsday, but he will not convince very many people in America that today there is no real danger or threat in this world, so far as the future peace and security of our Nation is concerned.

I am not talking particularly now about the conscription bill either. Not at all.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator from Connecticut for yielding to me. It was with some difficulty that I obtained that yielding. But he has not answered the question yet as to why he voted for the appropriation of billions upon billions of dollars if he did not think there was any danger to the homes, and to the safety, the security, the peace, the happiness and comfort of American citizens in the future.

Mr. DANAHER. I simply wish to remark that those present will say, and the RECORD will so show, that I was most happy to yield to my colleague from Illinois. I would not want any such imputation to the contrary to stand. Above all, Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senator if he thinks I was attempting in any way to say anything to the contrary.

Mr. DANAHER. I do not mean any discourtesy, but the cold written word going out over the country might be misconstrued; that is all.

Mr. LUCAS. I asked the Senator from Connecticut to yield two or three times, but he said he could not. That is perfectly all right.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Connecticut said he would yield to the Senator from Illinois, but he put him in a deferred status. [Laughter in the galleries.]

Mr. DANAHER. That is it—a deferred status.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The occupants of the galleries have been admonished two or three times. Under the rules of the Senate, no demonstration, no laughter, no applause, is permitted in the galleries. Occupants of the galleries are here as guests of the Senate. As our guests, they must obey the rules.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, without reflecting in the slightest on the ruling of the Chair or the admonition by the Chair, if the Senator from Kentucky says something that is really humorous, I laugh at it also, and I do not at all blame those in the galleries.

Mr. BARKLEY. I hope the Senator has no insidious or invidious implication in saying that he laughs at what I say.

Mr. DANAHER. I often laugh with the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say that I am one of those who voted for these billions of dollars of appropriations. I voted for them because the President of the United States said it was necessary that we should have adequate defense and because of the fact that I am not in a position to know specifically just what is needed for defense.

But I wish to say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that I did not vote for them because I was afraid that Mr. Hitler or Mr. Mussolini or the Japanese Government would come here and take over the United States of America. If I believed that, and if I believed, as the Senator from Texas said the other day he felt, that Germany was going to attack us, then I would not simply vote for these appropriations, and I would not simply vote to call out men for training or to conscript them; I would vote for a declaration of war, because if it be a fact that if England is defeated we shall be attacked by Germany, then, of course, we ought to vote for a declaration of war. Why do not those Senators who stand on the Senate floor and say they are afraid that Germany will come over here and attack us tomorrow, or the next day, or in 3 months' time, or in 6 months' time, have the courage to go to the people of the country and say, "Let us vote for a declaration of war"?

Mr. President, it is nonsense. Let me call attention to what Canada did, if the Senator from Connecticut will yield further.

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Canada passed a conscription act. Did the Canadian Government go before the people of that country and ask that they conscript men to send them overseas? Not at all. I have a copy of the act in my hand now. It provides:

> The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval, or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

That act was passed since the declaration of war by Canada against Germany. Yet the Parliament of Canada, while it voted for conscription, voted not to send those called outside Canada.

As I have said, when Senators rise on the floor of the Senate and say that we are going to be attacked next, and that it is necessary for us, in order to preserve democracy in this country, to have conscription, I say that conscription is one of the first steps, and has always been so recognized, away from democracy, whether it is taken in this country or in any other country. It is a step away from democracy. It is a step toward totalitarianism. The way to preserve democracy in the United States of America is not to set up conscription, it is not to take the lives and liberties of the people away from them. The way to preserve democracy in the United States of America is to make democracy work here, to find work for the unemployed, and to put our own house in order. If we do that we do not need to fear totalitarianism coming here and taking away the liberties of the American people.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me in order that I may ask the Senator from Montana a question?

Mr. DANAHER. Yes, indeed.

Mr. MALONEY. Does the Senator from Montana think the people of Switzerland made democracy work at home?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; I think Switzerland has done a very good job of it.

Mr. MALONEY. Does the Senator think they have been disturbed by conditions around them?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know what country would not be disturbed under the present conditions surrounding Switzerland. It is a small country, not much larger than the State of Connecticut, and it has Germany on one side, Italy on another, and France on yet another. But we cannot compare the United States with Switzerland.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will my colleague yield further?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. I was not trying to compare the United States with Switzerland. I was referring to the Senator's mention of democracy, and the need only for internal consideration, with a neglect of what happens outside. We cannot be unmindful of what goes on in other places.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator from Connecticut, in view of that question, that I was reading the other night the propaganda that was carried on during the last war in order to get us into the war. I was reading what was said by British Government representatives as to what they did in order to try to get us to carry on, and the slogans that were used for that purpose. What were they? They were the identical slogans that are being used today. What was it that was said at that time? The propaganda minister said that Germany was an autocracy, and that England was the last democracy left in Europe, and that if democracy failed there it would also fail in the United States of America.

The question of the Monroe Doctrine was also brought up in connection with this propaganda, and it was said that the German Government would violate the Monroe Doctrine and take over some of the South American countries. The same slogans were used at that time that are used now to get us into the war—to get Americans to say that this is our war.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana tell me what point he is trying to make by his statement?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I am sorry I cannot get the Senator to see the point. Perhaps it is due to my lack of clearness that I cannot make him see it. I am trying to get the Senator to see that the identical slogans which were used to try to get us into the last war are being used at the present time to get us into the present war.

Mr. MALONEY. I am not disputing that. The Senator from Montana need not make that argument to me.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not making it to the Senator from Connecticut. I am making it to the Senate of the United States. I thought there were other Senators present besides the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MALONEY. The Senator specifically addressed himself to me.

Mr. WHEELER. Not at all. I was looking at the Senator, but I was addressing the Senate.

Mr. MALONEY. I am very sorry. I thought the Senator from Montana asked my colleague to yield so he might reply to me and that he said he was replying to me, and then the Senator from Montana proceeded to talk about something entirely irrelevant to my question.

Mr. WHEELER. That is quite true.

Mr. MALONEY. I quite agree with the Senator from Montana that certain foreign nations would like to have us become involved in the war, and I quite agree with what he says in regard to war. I hate war as much as the Senator from Montana hates war, and he need not make that sort of an argument to me.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I was not making that argument to the Senator from Connecticut. I was making it to those Senators and to those people who have used exactly the same slogans that were used in the last war. I am addressing those who at the present time are using exactly the same slogans that were put out by the British Ministry of Propaganda before we entered the last war. It is being done at the present time by some Members of the Senate and by others.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. I merely wish to say, so that the RECORD may be clear, that I am entirely in accord with what the Senator from Montana has just said. I am not influenced by that propaganda.

Mr. WHEELER. If I gave the impression that I was addressing my remarks to the Senator from Connecticut, I wish to remove the impression. I was not. I did not know what his views were; but I have listened, as he has, to the same arguments by some Members of the Senate on the floor of the Senate, using exactly the same slogans that were used to get us into the last war.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. The Senator from Montana said that what the British said at that time was that if Germany won she would come over here and destroy the Monroe Doctrine, or go into South America. The only trouble with that argument is that Germany did not win, and we do not know whether or not she would have come over here.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator think she would have come over?

Mr. SCHWARTZ. I certainly think she would have come over if she had won the war.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to observe that it is probably to no effective purpose now to refer to the propaganda which was used in this country prior to our entry into the last war. We may well admit that it was used to the fullest possible extent on both sides. I recall that the German Ambassador to the United States, Count von Bernstorff, became practically persona non grata because he used his official status in this country as German Ambassador for purposes of spreading propaganda. I recall that Capt. Boy Ed and Franz von Papen—Mr. von Papen being now one of the trusted lieutenants of the Fuehrer in Germany—were practically asked to get out of this country because of their activities. So we may very well agree that prior to our entry into the World War both sides were engaged in propaganda. However, certainly nobody can contend that it was English propaganda which resulted in the sinking of the ships of the American people, flying the American flag, and the destruction of American lives, which were responsible for our ultimate entry into the war.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I wish to make only a brief observation. We have been talking about the Monroe Doctrine. It is not Germany which is in the Falkland Islands; it is Great Britain. It is not Germany which is in British Honduras, but Great Britain. It is not Germany which is sending one of her dukes to America, but Great Britain. If the Monroe Doctrine means anything, what has England to do in the Falkland Islands or British Honduras?

That is the only observation I wish to make.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

I wish to recur to the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not wish to take any of the Senator's time; but I think it would be in accordance with the facts to say that the Monroe Doctrine never sought to drive out of the Western Hemisphere any European power already in it. It applied only to the acquisition of new territory by foreign countries.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is correct; and the Falkland Islands were taken over by Great Britain after the Monroe Doctrine was announced.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not recall the date.

Mr. CHAVEZ. British Honduras was taken from Honduras in 1853, after the Monroe Doctrine was in existence.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not recall the date; but certainly not all the territory which Great Britain owns in America was taken over after the establishment of the Monroe Doctrine. I think the vast majority of her territory in the Western Hemisphere was owned by her before that time.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is correct; but so far as the Falkland Islands are concerned, they were taken over after the Monroe Doctrine was announced and declared to be the policy of the United States.

Great Britain took over British Honduras in 1853, as I recall, not with a view to defending Great Britain against Germany, but with a view to defending herself against the United States. British Honduras was taken over after the Monroe Doctrine was announced.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] for his patient courtesy with me. With his permission, I should like to come back to the bill for a moment.

Inviting the Senator's attention to that part of section 5 appearing on pages 20 and 21, particularly in subsections (c) and (d), I find that regular or duly ordained ministers of religion engaged in the regular discharge of their ministerial duties may receive a deferred training status.

I also discover that in subsection (d) there is provision for deferment of status with reference to conscientious objectors who are found to be such after individual hearing. They are entitled to exemption. Will the Senator from Texas please tell me whether or not students in regularly constituted theological seminaries are exempted from military service?

Mr. SHEPPARD. They are not.

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator state whether or not those, for instance, who have taken vows in certain orders are exempted? For example, I have in mind the Franciscan monks at the monastery in Washington, which is the mecca for many devotees who seek that particular shrine. Are such religious orders, including monks, exempt from a combatant status?

Mr. SHEPPARD. They are not.

Mr. DANAHER. Does not the Senator feel that very probably we ought to take steps to exclude the very small number—after all, the number is very small—who are regularly enrolled students in theological seminaries studying for the ministry, as well as those who have taken vows to live a life of peace, such as those in the orders to which I have referred?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not.

Mr. DANAHER. Was that matter gone into by the committee?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very thoroughly. I will say, however, that any of those men may be exempted if they will show that they have conscientious objections to killing people in war.

Mr. DANAHER. What it amounts to is that if a person can establish that in fact he has conscientious scruples against war and killing people in the process of war, he may be exempt from assuming a combatant status?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes.

Mr. DANAHER. And I believe properly so.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Whether he is a divinity student, or a member of one of the orders to which the Senator refers, or whether he belongs to no church at all.

Mr. DANAHER. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It depends upon what the individual thinks, regardless of the organization to which he belongs.

Mr. DANAHER. If we can undertake to assay the state of mind, and it can be found favorable to the claim that he is entitled to a conscientious-objector status, I agree that it is a wholly proper provision. I should want no less than that in the bill. In fact, I want more. That is why I asked the Senator the questions.

I now invite the attention of the Senator to section 8, subsection (c), in lines 8 to 13, inclusive, on page 24. In a moment I wish to direct the Senator's attention to a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is it not a fact that in the bill we passed in the last war, those who were attending theological seminaries and those who had taken religious orders were exempted?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not think so.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Perhaps the Senator is correct. I do not question his statement, because I assume the Senator has gone into the matter.

Mr. SHEPPARD. We exempted members of churches whose creeds prohibited their members from engaging in war. Under the pending bill we do not exempt any institutions or classes as such, but operate on the individual. If he wishes to claim exemption through conscientious objection to engaging in war, we have set up a tribunal to pass upon the validity of his claim.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I understand that. The bill exempts those who can establish the fact that they are conscientious objectors?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is correct; except, of course, that we make a direct exemption of ministers of religion.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Does the bill make a direct exemption of ministers of religion and not of those who are in the process of becoming ministers?

Mr. SHEPPARD. We do not exempt those in the process of becoming ministers, because many of them enroll in fake schools of religion when they see that they can evade service by pretending to study for the ministry. Many correspondence schools giving religious training spring up.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It is not a question of correspondence schools.

Mr. SHEPPARD. We are trying to avoid giving the opportunity to those who would endeavor fraudulently, under the pretense of becoming ministers, to evade service.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Fraud would vitiate anything; but that is not the problem. The problem is that there is a class of persons—not many in numbers, perhaps—who are attending theological schools and who may seek exemption. Does the Senator mean to tell me that those who are learning the teachings of Christ will not be exempted unless they prove that they are conscientious objectors?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes. A boy who dies on the battlefield for his country is carrying out the teachings of Christ as much as is the man who wants to stay at home to carry out the teachings of Christ. There is a sacramental suggestion in the blood of man shed for man, for family, for home, for country.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. There is a vast difference between the two. The bill makes a distinction. Will the Senator please look into the matter—I shall also look into it in the interim—to determine the question of whether or not we exempted such persons in the last war?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I told the Senator my impression.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I know the Senator did.

Mr. SHEPPARD. We have no assurance that the student will ever complete his course.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Of course we may question any man's motive, and arrive at any conclusion we wish.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am not questioning the motive of anyone.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes; the Senator is.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Something may happen to keep him from completing his course.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is true. He may die, or anything may happen. However, I did not understand the Senator to say positively, or with any degree of certainty, that such a provision was not included in the bill passed in the last war.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am willing to join the Senator in an effort to find out what was the fact.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is what I asked.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If we find the fact to be as I have indicated, will the Senator consent to an amendment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not think so.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator does not think so?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not think so.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then the Senator disagrees with the previous law, and disagrees with everybody else.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; I do not; and the committee joined in the report on the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. But the committee, I assume, did not study this question at all, or the chairman would have some degree of certainty regarding what was in the last bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill operates on the basis of what the particular individual believes as to war, and we do not exempt any class except ministers themselves. That is the principle on which the bill operates.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Those to whom I refer are practically ministers, men who have come within a month of finishing their courses of study, and who have pursued their peaceful avocations during their lives thus far. Those men are entitled to receive the benefit of an exemption, are they not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not think so.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Very well, then, we will fight it out.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, now let me refer the Senator from Texas to the provision on page 24, which reads:

> (c) Any person who is restored to a position in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (A) or (B) of subsection (b) shall be so restored without loss of seniority, insurance participation or benefits, or other benefits, and such person shall not be discharged from such position without cause within 1 year after such restoration.

Let me ask the Senator, please, if he feels that Congress properly can superimpose upon an existing contract of employment between a substitute, if you choose, for a conscriptee and the employer a clause which will so operate as to cause the employer to rehire and to restore the conscriptee to his former position?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Frankly, I do not know. We are trying to do everything we can to help the men called into the service get back their jobs.

Mr. DANAHER. Then, let me ask if it is the understanding of the Senator that, under the clause providing that the conscriptee shall be restored without loss of insurance participation or benefits, that someone else is going to make up somehow to, let us say, the employer's reserve fund the amount of contribution which the particular employee formerly paid into that fund?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That provision refers solely to the benefits to which he was entitled up to the time he left his employment. It does not apply to the time when he was absent in the service.

Mr. DANAHER. But when the bill provides that he shall be restored without loss of insurance participation or benefits, or other benefits, is it meant by that that if a man goes out to serve his country under this conscription plan and comes back he assumes his prior status less 1 year's payment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is what this bill intends, as I understand. That is what the members of the committee thought should be and could be done.

Mr. DANAHER. It is not a case of someone else from some source making up those payments?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No.

Mr. DANAHER. A day or two ago we discussed the theory, or the lack of it, if you like, of the application of the National Labor Relations Act to a situation such as is contemplated here. I take it that what the Senator understood with reference to the bill affecting the National Guard and the Officers' Reserves has equal application to the language in the pending bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator. I wish to thank him especially for his courtesy.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am very glad to answer any questions, especially from the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I intend to take but little of the time of the Senate now, because I propose in a few moments to move that we suspend for the present the consideration of the bill; but in view of the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] in reply to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] a while ago when the Senator from Illinois asked him a question concerning his vote and attitude on certain appropriations, and since it seemed to me that, as a basis for the answer which he intended to give to the Senator from Illinois, the Senator from Connecticut started out on a sort of political speech by implication and insinuation to blame the administration now in power for the situation which calls forth these appropriations and other legislation, I should like to make a brief comment.

It has been my feeling all along—and I entertain that feeling now—that in the consideration of this bill we should rise above partisanship, that we should not accuse any political party of being responsible for the situation which makes defense appropriations and legislation necessary. But if that is to be the basis on which the pending measure is to be discussed, I can assure the Senator from Connecticut that we are perfectly willing to have it passed upon on that basis. We are perfectly willing to have the record of the last 7 years, both in connection with the Army and the Navy, compared with the record of the previous 12 years in order that the American people may understand, if it is desired to deal with the question on that basis, who has been responsible for most of the lack of preparation which now is so jauntily referred to by the Senator from Connecticut. I hope that during this entire discussion we may avoid any partisan rancor or any partisan reference. I hope that we may not be led into any partisan discussion, because, in my judgment, this is not a partisan question.

The American people believe by an overwhelming majority that, without regard to anybody's political affiliations, every man owes a duty to his country and to its institutions, and that duty is no less compulsive among the rank and file of the people than it is here on the floor of the Senate. The legislation which we enact affects all the people without regard to their politics or their religion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope that in the discussion of this bill we may consider it on the high ground the Senator has outlined; but still, while I have no intention of diverging from that course, and while I feel bitterly opposed to this bill, I would have to admit, I think, in order to be fair, that any Senator who felt that any political party was to blame for any unfavorable condition would be justified in calling attention to it if he wanted to do so. I do not know that anybody feels that way; I hope there is no such feeling; but still the Senator must admit, I think, that it is within the right of anyone in discussing this bill, if he thinks he properly can and that he ought to do so, to blame any political party with any dereliction.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not dispute that, with a reservation. If by the bringing in of any partisan complaint or charge or any recital, light can be shed upon the situation with reference to the measure now before us, whether one is for it or against it, and it is not done simply to seek some partisan advantage in the discussion, the Senator would be right; but I doubt the propriety of injecting partisan politics into the discussion simply for the purpose of attempting to gain political advantage.

Mr. NORRIS. If I had my way, I should like to keep everything out of partisan politics; but, of course, I do not have my way, and I do not suppose anybody agrees with me fully in that respect.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Nebraska occupies the unique and distinguished position of being the outstanding advocate of nonpartisanship not only in the Senate but in the country with respect to vital legislation, and, while all of us cannot always rise to the high eminence which the Senator has attained, we all honor him for the convictions which he entertains and which he has done so much, I believe, to impart to the American people and to the United States Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The question was suggested to me when I came into the Chamber recently and heard some of the debate between the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Texas in regard to restoring soldiers to the place of employment which they occupied previously in private business. I feel as deeply as anybody can the desirability of that occurring and happening, if it can be made possible. Yet I do not think we ought to deceive ourselves, and we should not do something that might, although entirely innocently, deceive the soldiers who would be in the Army and their friends by suggesting that the law would do certain things which I cannot see how any law we might pass could do.

Does the Senator believe that a provision in a statute to the effect that when any soldier leaves the service and returns to his home, the position which he occupied before he entered the service shall be restored to him, would have any legal effect whatever?

Mr. BARKLEY. I doubt very much whether it could have any legal effect, especially in those industries and occupations that have no relationship to interstate commerce. It may be possible that under the National Defense Act and under this proposed law such occupations as have to do with interstate commerce may be subject to such a provision. But even in such cases I think there are bound to be exceptions as to which it would not be possible to enforce such legislation, because within a year the entire condition may change.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, it might entirely change. But the point I want to make—and I think it ought, at least, to be in the RECORD—if we are going to let that language stay in the bill, so that no man who enters the Army will be deceived—that, while we are anxious to restore him to the position he had before he went into the service, and while we believe it is the patriotic duty of the corporation or individual that employed him to restore him, if possible, we ought not let the idea go out to the country so that those who enlist or are drafted will enter the service under the belief that at the end of their service the positions which they formerly held will be reserved for them under the law passed by the Congress.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the Senator's frankness, and I share that desire. I think it is the desire of all of us.

I do not happen to be a member of the Military Affairs Committee, and I was not present during the hearings or the discussion in the committee on that point; but I think it is true that we all hope and wish, and so far as we can would like to provide, that when these men come back and go into civil life—as we hope all of them will do, on the ground that they may not be necessary to serve further in the Army—they may have their positions restored to them; but it would not be a frank statement to say or to hold out the hope to all of them that that can be done.

Mr. NORRIS. I should hate to have the country get the impression that if I were the employer of a large or a modest number of men in a factory, or some institution of that kind, I was going to restore to his original position, at the end of his service, every employee who enlisted or who was drafted. I should hate to put the manufacturer in such an attitude that many persons would say he was in duty bound, under the law, to restore these men to their positions. I think, as a patriotic citizen, he ought to restore them to their positions if possible; but there will be thousands and thousands of cases in which it will be absolutely impossible for the employer to do that, no matter how patriotic he is.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. And I should not like to put him in the attitude in the community in which he lives of being a slacker, or something of the kind.

Mr. BARKLEY. There might be numerous instances in which, in the period of the year covered by the absence of the regular employees, the condition of the company would have so changed that they could not take on additional employees. They might even have fewer regular employees at the end of the year than they had at the time the individual employees entered the service; and in cases of that sort it seems to me we could not require a company to restore the employment of men who, if there had been no military service, might have been discharged during the year because of a necessary reduction of the company's force.

While I do want to hold out the hope, and the moral obligation, and the legal obligation insofar as we can, that these men are not to lose their status when they return by reason of their service to their country, I do not think it would be fair to undertake to deceive the American people into the belief that every individual who is to be called into service can be restored to his particular job.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator from Kentucky that it seems to me it is a very serious question whether the Congress of the United States ought to run the risk of deceiving our people, or any goodly share of them, into the idea that a man's position is to be held open for him. When a citizen holding a job in some manufacturing establishment gives it up for patriotic reasons, or the Government compels him by a draft to give it up and go into the service of his country, it is the saddest of all things, it seems to me, to see that man, after he has given the best years of his life to the service of his country, come back and find that, after all, he is nothing but a pauper, and there is no job for him.

If there is any way to remedy that state of affairs, I should like to do it; but it seems to me it is beyond the power of anybody, any government or any Congress, to remedy; and I am very doubtful whether we ought to put into this bill anything that might under any condition bring about a deception of some of our people on that account.

While I probably ought not to have my ideas as to what shall be in the bill considered as fully as the ideas of those who favor the proposed legislation, because I am opposed to the legislation and shall vote against it—I am bitterly opposed to the principle—yet, if we must have this bill enacted, I should like to relieve it of any such possibility. It is a possibility that may come home to our people 50 years after we shall have disappeared from the face of the earth, because the story will go from mouth to mouth that Congress deceived them when it passed the law and that men were unable to support their wives and their families because of their service in the United States Army.

That certainly would be very deplorable, and if we can possibly do so, we should prevent it rather than to try to make anybody believe that we are going to do something that we certainly cannot do, as we will realize if we think about it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate what the Senator has said. His statement, of course, as we all know, is in accord with his lifelong record of being frank and forthright with the American people and with the Senate. When we get to that point in the bill it may be possible to enter more into detail into this discussion, and determine whether the language goes too far, or what modification in the language of the bill may be desired.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to read the clause of the bill under consideration?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is as follows:

> If such person was in the employ of a private employer, such employer shall restore such person to such position or to a position of like status and pay, unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. In my opinion, that does not lead us anywhere. I have read that language, and I concede that the committee were acting in good faith in putting it in. I am afraid, however, it will do more harm than good. When we say "unless the employer's conditions have changed," we raise a question as to which there might be honest differences of opinion. The person who lost his job would say, "Your conditions have not changed." The employer would say, "They have changed. I cannot restore you now"; and, after all, if it is his factory and he is paying the salaries, we cannot leave him out of consideration in settling the controversy. To say to him, "You are compelled to restore this man," it seems to me, asks for an impossibility, and one that cannot be enforced under our laws, or the laws of any other free government.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, if that language creates only a moral obligation, there is no way to enforce it. If it creates a legal obligation, it can be enforced, of course, in the courts, which would naturally involve litigation; but it could be enforced.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BURKE. In connection with the matter now under discussion, I think every Member of the Senate who has not yet had the opportunity to do so should carefully read the testimony of Col. Lewis Sanders, particularly beginning on page 89 of the printed record. I will read merely a short excerpt from it to throw some light on this problem, coming from experience in the World War.

Colonel Sanders had this to say:

> We came back to New York City under very adverse employment conditions. A very large percentage of the employment in New York City is service employment, like the operation of elevators and other work which could be, and was, taken over by women in large groups, and they did not like to give up their jobs when the men came back, and the employers were not overenthusiastic about letting them go, because the women's wage scale was substantially lower than that of the men. However, we had 13,000 men in the Greater New York area whose employers had promised to hold their jobs open for them. With very few exceptions, those promises were made good. The few exceptions that came to my attention, I merely had to send one of my staff officers up to the employer and say, "This has been reported to us. We would like the facts, because the newspapers desire such information and we want to be sure we are not doing an injustice by giving out your name erroneously." The officers in every case came back with the job.
> At the end of 6 months we had placed 9,600 men in new jobs; had practically closed up our employment bureau. We reduced it to only the secretary of the clubhouse, because no other was needed. We did not have a man in the division, to the best of my recollection, at that time who had not been placed in a job. Our unemployed was exclusively at that time the comparatively small group of men who were constitutionally unable to hold a job after they got it. Our record-breaker we placed 22 times. I think he probably is still out of a job.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on what page is that testimony?

Mr. BURKE. It is on page 90 of the record. I read further:

> Another thing. We found that men coming out of the Army had a greater economic efficiency than before they went in. I was talking to the late Richard Rice, general manager at that time of the Lynn Works of the General Electric Co., employing 14,000 men, and gave him my opinion that a man having had the benefit of Army service was about a 20-percent better man than he had been when he went in. His reply was, "You are overconservative. We have had 700 men return from the Army, and they are considerably better than that."

I wish to say only this in connection with this interruption: Personally, I have faith in the employers of the country that in an emergency they will to the fullest possible extent, and without any provision in the law—although I have no objection to this provision—go to the utmost limit in seeing that the men who give up their employment and enter the service of the country, will, when they come back, if it is humanly possible, find their jobs waiting for them.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. BURKE. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree that the large percentage, indeed, almost all, of the employers of the country are patriotic; that they will restore the men to their positions if they can do so. But that is not unanimous, and it is the exception to the rule which makes it necessary to make laws, and which brings about the enactment of laws. A majority of the people are patriotic and honest, and would get along very well if we did not have any laws, but because there are a few who are exceptions, we have to pass laws to protect the great majority of the people from the few evildoers and those who will not respect law.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In a moment I shall be through. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor, although he has not been talking very much, and that is an exception for him.

Mr. BARKLEY. That may be to the Senate's advantage.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not agree that the man who serves in war is a better man when he comes out at the close of the war than he was when he entered. If a man served only a short time, it might be true that the training he would receive would do him good and make him a better man physically. But I lay it down as a proposition which I do not believe can be successfully controverted, that any man in any war, especially a war of modern times, who is in active service, and goes through the trials and tribulations and suffering and agony which come to every soldier in that kind of a war, gives up some of his strength, some of his vitality, and some of his ability, so that, as a general rule, he is not quite as able as he was when he went in.

I think that was demonstrated after the Civil War. A man who has to go through the tribulations and trials and sufferings which come to every soldier gives up some of his vitality, something from his life. That does not apply to a man who is sitting on a swivel chair, it is true, but it does apply to the men who do the real work in the field. They cannot expect to serve an enlistment of 3 years in that kind of service without its affecting their health and their ability to earn and maintain themselves and their families.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. In connection with what the senior Senator from Nebraska has been saying, I think it is very true that there is something very distressing and pathetic about a man who is established in a certain position having to leave it and, when he comes back, finding it is no longer open to him. For that reason I should like to submit to the Senator from Nebraska and to the Senate as a whole the taking of men when they are so young that they have not yet acquired a real job status, and thereby do them a minimum amount of harm from the standpoint of their employment, taking them at an age when the fatigue and the depletion of vitality, to which the Senator referred, would be at the minimum. That is a suggestion which I have embodied in a bill which I myself have introduced, and which I think has a great deal to commend it for the reason I have stated.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield so that I may ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been laboring under the impression ever since the World War that there are branches in the military service in which young men are considered more desirable than older men. As an illustration, let us take the Air Service. I have the impression that the Air Service wants men whose judgment perhaps is not fully matured. They want reckless men, men who will take desperate chances. A man of 25 years of age would not be so apt to take that kind of a chance, perhaps, as a man of 18. Is that not a well-recognized principle in the Air Service?

Mr. LODGE. I believe so.

Mr. NORRIS. So that there would be at least some branches in the service in which the best result could be obtained by taking even the immature and those not fully developed.

Mr. LODGE. I should not be in favor of taking a boy who had not reached the age of 21, but I think that for almost all military purposes, so far as soldiers are concerned, a man is at his best, from a military standpoint, when he is in his early twenties. I believe the average age of all the famous armies in history has been in the early twenties so far as the enlisted men were concerned.

I make this suggestion merely because very few men at 21 have been able to develop a substantial type of employment, whereas when they get to be 25 or 26 years of age they are begining to develop some real earning power.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. Would the Senator from Massachusetts take young men at 21 who had not completed their college courses?

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean students for the ministry?

Mr. MALONEY. I mean any college student.

Mr. LODGE. I think the provision in the bill regarding the senior R. O. T. C. students is probably a wise one, but so far as the others are concerned I have not given the matter a great deal of study.

Mr. MALONEY. If the Senator has not given it study, I cannot address a further question to him, but I hope he will consider the matter very seriously, because it seems to me tremendously important that we do not take a young man out of college in his second or third or last year, when we might under any bill we pass give him a deferred status until he has completed his undergraduate college work.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator would not treat a boy in college differently from the way he treated a boy who could not afford to go to college, would he?

Mr. MALONEY. I would put him in a deferred status, if I could, in the bill, assuming it is to pass. I would give him the opportunity for military training while in college. I would subject him to all of the provisions of whatever bill we might pass immediately upon the completion of his college course, and I would limit it to 24 years of age. I have prepared an amendment which takes in theological and ecclesiastical students, and also takes in other college students. I respectfully call it to the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. The question raised by the Senator from Massachusetts is a very legitimate one, as to whether after all the battles of the Republic and the defense of our country are to be imposed upon the extremely young. I realize that, because of their situation, they may be more conveniently called than men who are older, because of lack of obligations, domestic and otherwise. But if the theory of the proposed legislation is correct, as I believe it to be—and I mean by that that it is the duty of all of our people, in accordance with their ability and their obligation and responsibility, to defend the country against whatever it is necessary to defend it—that raises the question whether, if we are to emphasize the calling into service of young men 21 or 22 or 23 years of age, we do not overemphasize the release of others who are under the same if not greater obligation and responsibility to the country than the immature young man who is even just out of college or high school.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, no matter what age limit may be selected, there are always arguments against it, and the Senator has stated a criticism, and I think to some extent a valid criticism, of my suggestion. But I think to assume that the burden of war can be equally distributed over the entire population is a hallucination.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree that we cannot distribute it.

Mr. LODGE. We cannot do that.

Mr. BARKLEY. We cannot distribute it equally among all of the people.

Mr. LODGE. We cannot do it.

Mr. BARKLEY. But we can at least spread it out over a sufficient field so that it will not unnecessarily concentrate itself on a group because of their youth.

Mr. LODGE. It can be done, but if we once start drawing lines, we shall discriminate in any event. Of course, if we had a peacetime, long view system of military training, we would have our training come each year whenever a boy reached the age of 21, and have it all confined to one year.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, if we had had, as we did not, such a system as that, for a long enough period of years, so that every man who is now 31 would have been trained when he was 21, many of the questions we now face would not be at our doorstep.

Mr. LODGE. That is very true.

Mr. BARKLEY. But we are beginning from scratch, as we say, to consider men who have not been trained, regardless of their age, except in certain isolated cases in which they went to military training schools, or have been members of the R. O. T. C., or other voluntary training organizations.

Mr. LODGE. That is very true; and if we were at war I think the broader we extended the field probably the better. But, after all, we are at peace, and I assume the reason we want this Army and the reason we want this defense establishment is that it will keep us at peace. I firmly believe that if we develop our Army and Navy so that they are so manifestly strong that their strength is obvious to all the world, this terrible war will not be brought to our country. That is why I am in favor of the development of our forces.

If I thought the Army was being developed because we wanted to get into a war, I would be opposed to it. I believe that we want this Army in order to keep us out of war. Of course, it is no more unfair to take men from 21 to 25 years of age than it is to take men from 21 to 31 years of age.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection it seems to me there is no fundamental difference, when we really think the matter through, between the training of these men or a similar number of men after we get into war and the training of them before we get in. The theory, of course, is that if we train them beforehand, and we do get into war, they will be ready for war when the war begins, whereas, if we wait till war comes before we train them, we shall have the same situation as that which existed in 1917 and 1918, when we had to wait 13½ months before the men whom we drew for the service were trained sufficiently to be sent into combat areas. Of course, that is a debatable system. I realize that honest men have different theories about it. But I went through that period in the House of Representatives. There was a great fight in the House and Senate then over the question of the selective draft, and it was adopted on the theory that it was the fairest way, after all, to raise an army, even in the midst of war, because it did not leave to the individual, however well qualified he might be to fight, to determine whether he would fight, but it left it to the people, or to their Government at least, to decide, or to have a voice in the decision.

The only difference, it seems to me, in the matter of training beforehand or afterhand, is that we hope we will never go to war. I share the hope of the Senator in that respect, and I hope that whatever we do in the matter of defense will keep us out of war, will make it unnecessary for us to go to war, will ward off any attack from whatever source it might come. But I cannot for the life of me see any fundamental difference between training men so they will be ready if war comes, and waiting until the war comes, and then train them for a period of a year or so before they will be of any benefit to the country in the way of being fighting soldiers.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to submit one thought, and then I shall subside. I think there is a distinction between a peacetime selective-service law and a wartime selective-service law. In a wartime selective-service law, when there is a real chance that men will lose their lives and suffer all kinds of wounds, obviously we must make the age limit just as broad as we can make it. In peacetime, when there is an excellent chance that we will not go to war and when our whole policy is directed toward staying out of war, I think it is perfectly legitimate to subject certain groups to training under a peacetime law. If we subject a man to training, that is an entirely different thing from subjecting a man to shell fire. That is the whole distinction I wish to make.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I appreciate that distinction. There would probably be a necessity for different details in connection with the application of a draft law passed after we got into a war, compared with one passed in peacetime. But that affects only the details of its application and does not affect the fundamental principle or obligation of the people to be of service in time of emergency.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I wish to say that I agree with what the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has said with respect to the pending bill. I think the purpose of the bill is to keep us out of war. I think we are not contemplating the drafting of these men with the view to becoming involved in war. I have heard many of my colleagues say that the bill was for the purpose of training men so that in the future they would be in a physical condition to defend their country.

I wish to make one observation. In 1933, when our President was inaugurated, we formulated legislation providing for the establishment of what are known as the C. C. C. camps. Since that time we have had these camps, and we have trained in them approximately 1,400,000 men. If at the time we inaugurated those camps we had permitted the men who went to them to indulge in military activities to the extent at least of participating in the manual of arms, we would have today in this land about 1,400,000 men who would have had the training which we are in a sense proposing for them now.

Mr. President, I have just noted in the columns of the afternoon newspaper, the Washington News, that the cartel plan has been abandoned. I was very happy to note that. If the administration had gone ahead with that plan I think it would simply have meant that the taxpayers of the United States would have been called upon to put up anywhere from $1,500,000,000 to $2,000,000,000 annually for the purpose of buying up the surplus crops of South America, of coffee and cotton and other products of the republics to the south of us. I believed then and I believe now that if we would surround Central and South America with a wall of gold, and would take all the billions of dollars in gold bullion we have now buried in the State of our able leader, we could not eventually keep the totalitarian powers out of South America. If the American taxpayers were to put up about $2,000,000,000 a year for the next 10 years, we might during the course of that time be successful in keeping the totalitarian powers out, but eventually we would find the totalitarian powers ganging up on us; we would find that they would use some method by which they could get the surplus products of South America which they must have.

In connection with that thought, we must take into consideration the fact that the very things they produce in surplus in South America and in Central America are produced here.

So I am glad that we have decided not to waste $2,000,000,000 annually of the taxpayers' money to try to keep the totalitarian powers out of there. We should bring ourselves to a realization that the time is soon to come when we shall have to compete with the other nations of the world on the question of labor and trade.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, earlier in the day the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] asked me as to the size of the force required to administer selective service. I now have that information, as follows:

Local boards, 25,000; appeal boards, 11,500; appeal agents, 6,500; doctors, 6,500; advisory boards for registrants, 65,000, making a total of 114,500 required for the personnel of the selective-service administration.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. That means an average of practically one appeal board for every two local boards. What is the necessity of having an appeal board for every two local boards? Why could not an appeal board have jurisdiction over the territory or the work of more than two local boards?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am unable to answer that question. I think it is because of the volume of the work. However, the Senator has asked a very proper question, and I shall look into it.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I think one object is to avoid compelling those who appeal to travel great distances.

Mr. BARKLEY. I assume that the figure of 25,000 local boards means a board in each county, or practically so. With modern means of transportation it seems to me that an appeal board might exercise jurisdiction over several counties or several boards. I think that phase of the question probably ought to be looked into, because it strikes me that the appeal boards are a little top-heavy as compared with the local boards.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to say to my good friend the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] that I have ascertained that during the World War ministry students were exempted from liability for military service. The theory of the pending bill is to operate on the individual, and not on any class of individuals, except the class of actually ordained ministers. If a divinity student can show that he is a conscientious objector to taking part in war, he will be exempted.

I wish to say to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] that the War Department reported to the Senate Military Affairs Committee that the cost of the National Guard and trainees would be $800,000,000 for trainees and $350,000,000 for the National Guard during this fiscal year.

Almighty and everlasting God, who art always more ready to hear than we to pray and art wont to give more than either we desire or deserve: Pour down upon us the abundance of Thy mercy, forgiving us those things whereof our conscience is afraid, and giving us those good things which we are not worthy to ask but through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of presenting briefly what I believe to be objections to the proposed legislation now pending, objections which make such legislation untenable unless we are radically to change the future history of our country.

I feel very deeply about this proposed legislation. There is one aspect of it, one objection to it, which so far as I know, has received but scant notice. To me that objection is the most serious of any, because I think it has direct bearing upon a fundamental principle which must prevail if our democracy is to be permanent. There are other objections to this bill, serious I think, but which to me do not present the same logical cause for opposition to the measure as is presented when we think of the effect this proposed legislation will have upon the future of our country.

Compulsory military training in time of peace, Mr. President, as I see it, cannot long prevail in a democratic form of government without leading that government into the realm of dictatorship.

I desire first, Mr. President, to pay my respects to those who favor this bill. I do not question their fidelity, their patriotism, their ability, or their logic. We are living in times when all of us, whether or not we favor a large standing Army, whether or not we favor a large Navy, or a large air force, cannot be unmindful of world conditions. I confess that within the past 2 or 3 years, looking at the question, as I believe, fairly and honestly and conscientiously, I have been compelled to modify views on this question which I have held during all of my mature life.

I take it that no one in the Senate wants to engulf this country in the world catastrophe now going on in Europe. When I hear Senators, as I have heard them in the Senate, say they are in favor of compulsory military training in order to keep us out of war, having respect for their opinions, their judgment, and their honesty, I am compelled to admit, when I disagree with men of such ability, there may be some doubt as to my position, and yet to me it is as clear as the noonday sun.

I think the great objection to this legislation is the effect it will have on the history of our country in the years to come. It will bring about a radical change in the historic course we have taken since the birth of our Nation. As I see it, Mr. President, that change, if it takes place, will inevitably lead us into a realm where we will have what we are complaining about in other nations—a dictatorship. I can see no escape from it. If we are to have compulsory military training in time of peace, we shall put ourselves on a level with the dictator nations of the world. To me, it seems perfectly clear, and it is with a feeling of hesitancy and of great regret that I take the floor now to give expression to my views on the question as they pertain to the effect of this bill upon our history as a government.

In my opposition to this legislation, Mr. President, I am not thinking so much of today as I am of tomorrow. I am thinking of the children who are still unborn and of the future mothers and fathers who are now the little children of our Nation if we establish compulsory military training in time of peace. I am thinking of the little child when he first opens his eyes and gets a view of his surroundings. I am thinking of the environment in which he will have to live. I am thinking of how it will affect all our descendants to be born in an atmosphere where the prevailing and most important thing connected with their lives is service in a conscripted army, devoting all or most of their lives to learning how to murder and to slay, even though it be called war.

I wish I could impress upon my fellow Members and upon the people of the country what I think is the important thing we ought to consider. When a little child is born in a country controlled by an army, the chief end in view for every boy will be that some day he must attain a place in a military establishment where he can learn how to fight and how to murder. He will know no other atmosphere. He will live in no other atmosphere. He has come into a world dominated by militarism. He has come into a world where the ruler eventually will care more for training his people in the arts of warfare than for training them in the arts of peace.

It never has been that way in this country. We have lived in an environment of peace all our lives, except for an occasional war. We were not always warlike. We were not always learning how to kill our fellow men, against whom we had no grudge, against whom we had no enmity, and for whom we had a fellowship of kindness and of love. Yet, surrounded by a military force that engulfs everything else with it, the children of the future will come into a world where all those attributes will be absent, and they will not see them; they will not observe them. They will grow up in a country where the eventual ambition of every boy will be to see how far he can ascend on the military ladder. The finer sensibilities of human nature will be absent. The finer sensibilities of peace and love for one's fellow man will have disappeared. They will not be there. The child will not see them as he grows up. The predominating thing in the life of the Nation and the individual will be to know how to fight and how to kill.

Will that affect human nature? I think it will. I think it will change it. It will revolutionize it. Mothers and fathers will grow up in this atmosphere, knowing nothing about the finer attributes of living in peace and harmony with their neighbors. They will think only of the exploits of generals, of battles in which millions of men are killed. They will think that is the great end of life. They will look with pride upon their little children, but will not undertake to guide their footsteps in any other direction. They will know of no other direction themselves. Everything will be military. They will learn to fight, and to die, if necessary, at the command of the ruler. That is the kind of a world into which compulsory military training brings us. The finer things of life are blotted out; they disappear. To my mind that is the greatest objection to the proposed legislation.

Mr. President, I traveled in Germany at one time, the only time I have ever been in Europe. It was in a time of peace, many years ago. I had just entered upon my service in the House of Representatives. There was not a war cloud in the sky. The world was at peace. With a small committee of the other House of Congress I went to Berlin. I went there a day or two before the great national military maneuvers took place, and, with three or four of my colleagues, I was invited to see the maneuvers. The Kaiser, learning that Members of the American Congress were there and desired to see the maneuvers, sent an official carriage for our accommodation. We drove into the country where one of the greatest armies I had ever seen was on parade. There was military marching, there was the artillery, there was the cavalry. It was a great day in Germany. Every German, from the little child just out of the cradle to the gray-haired man tottering to his approaching grave, was wildly enthusiastic about that day.

We saw the maneuvers. There was on our carriage some kind of a mark. I myself did not see it, but there was some mark on the side of it, some designation, which indicated that it was a royal carriage, and when the little boy and girl in the street, the young man and the young woman, saw that carriage, although they did not know who was in it, they took off their hats, and saluted the carriage. It had a mark of royalty on it. It was a great thing for them to salute it. It gave them a thrill. It made them proud of their country. There was an emblem of royalty, there was an emblem of dictatorship, perhaps not larger than one's hand, on the side of the carriage, which said to them, "Here is something which in some way is related to divinity itself."

The Army was greater than anything else in the country. Men and women of all classes were one in their attitude toward it, because they had grown up in that atmosphere. They never knew what it was to live in any other. Hence they were not to be blamed. Their attitude was perfectly natural. It was human nature. That was the greatest day of the year for all the citizens of that great empire.

The different provinces had their yearly military celebration. I traveled in different sections of the empire. I would be awakened in the night by the sound of the tramp, tramp, tramp upon the streets, and when I rose from my bed in the early morning I saw men in uniform plodding along. I saw the cannon; I saw the cavalry at that early hour marching to some place where military maneuvers demanded their presence. The whole country was alive with the military spirit.

Mr. President, what effect did that have upon the people? That had been going on in that country for many years. No one lived there then who knew any other life. It was always the same. Their natures were changed, were perverted.

When an officer of the Army happened to stroll along the sidewalk, with his sword dangling by his side, little children and grown-up men and women would get off the sidewalk in order that he might pass. They had no feeling of resentment. They were proud to give way to the soldier. They were glad of the opportunity to get a glimpse of him as he passed.

I rode on a train through the country. It was in September. The fall crops were being gathered. I saw mostly women in the fields. I remember a hay field we passed one day. About a dozen women were on that little farm, some with rakes, some taking the hay up and putting it in piles by hand, some with pitchforks. There was one man, and he was driving the only team in sight. He sat in the seat and drove the mowing machine. There was only one man, but there were a dozen or two dozen women. I said to the man at my side, a German with whom I had been talking for some time, "Where are the men?" The answer came, "In the Army." Yes, they were in the Army.

Those women were proud of what they were doing. They had never known any other condition, and they were willing to toil in the sun and do labor which we would do almost anything to prevent our women doing. They were willing to toil and sweat their lives away in order that their sons and their husbands might be supported in the Army and learn to be soldiers.

There was no dissatisfaction. If we, too, had always that kind of an atmosphere surrounding us, there would be none here. If we were born and reared in such an atmosphere, we might never know of the happier things of life—of the dearer things. We might not know anything about the love and affection which the lowly Nazarene said we should bear to our brethren. That would all have been forgotten and cast aside. We would be military men. One-half of the people would toil in misery and drudgery that the other half might be clothed in uniforms and learn how to handle muskets and other weapons.

Do we want that in our country? Is not that the difference between a dictatorship and a democracy? Do we want to convert our country into that kind of a place? It seems to me, although the thought may be bitter, that rather than put my country into that kind of condition I would rather see the end come and cross the river into eternity. If that is all this life means, then life, indeed, as I see it, is a failure—and that is what it means, Senators. We may not believe it, but I think that in your hearts, when you consider it, you must realize that what I say is true.

What are the dictator nations? Who are they, prowling around, tramping upon innocent people? Someone said, "Think of Holland, think of Denmark, think of Czechoslovakia." The fate that has befallen them is the reason why, it is indicated, we should pass the pending measure. There may be something in that argument when applied to Europe, but there is absolutely nothing in it when applied here. If we were a small country, with a nation controlled by a dictator next to us, I can understand that we might feel our salvation depended upon arming ourselves to the teeth and training all our people so they would know how to fight if war came. The argument for arming may apply to Europe, but the logic that applies to Europe does not apply altogether to America. If we were a nation in Europe, surrounded by dictator powers, I should feel differently. I think it can easily be shown that a condition such as exists in Europe does not exist on this side of the ocean, and, not only that, but that there is no danger of such a situation existing here, provided we do what we have already undertaken to do—increase our Navy, increase our air force, and increase our standing Army, as we have already provided for. We have passed legislation providing for practically doubling the standing Army. We have given the President authority to call out the National Guard. I would not have been willing to do that 10 years ago, but, Mr. President, I voted for that legislation now because I am not unmindful of world conditions, and I thought it was necessary for us to take the course we have taken.

But, Mr. President, is there no limit to all this? Is there no place on God's earth for men who want to be peaceful, who want to love their fellow men, who want to live in peace and harmony? Has the world gone so far astray that there is no nook or corner in it for any except those who want to fight and kill? If that be true, then the world is not worth saving. If that be true, and we are to live only to see how big an Army and how strong a Navy we can get for the purpose of killing innocent people, or even for the purpose of defending our shores from a war-mad world ruled by dictators, then life has lost all the attributes and all the adjuncts that make it happy and that make us love our homes, our fellow men, and our children.

Mr. President, when I was in Germany and looked over its fields and saw women working in them, I asked, "Where are the men?" If compulsory military training is adopted in the United States, and conscription becomes our national policy, 50 years from now travelers in our country will see women in the fields, will see women digging potatoes, putting up the hay, picking corn, threshing wheat, because the men will be in the Army. I had rather not have a country, if that is the kind of country we must have. As I see the situation, however, there is no reason for our having such a country.

Hitler, perhaps the greatest dictator in the world, is, I believe, hated by more peace-loving people throughout the civilized world than any other man. Stalin rules great Russia. Mussolini rules Italy. Then there is also Japan. Those four nations are dictator nations. Every one of those dictators is dreaming of the time when his particular nation shall rule the world. This is a natural result of dictatorship.

Hitler dreams of that time, and so do many of his people. Stalin dreams of that time and so do many of his people. The same thing is true of Mussolini and the Italian people; it holds true with respect to Japan. Each dictator believes the country over which he rules occupies a superior place in history, is a superior product of the handiwork of God Almighty, and that his people are destined eventually to rule the world. That is what the Kaiser thought in his day. That is what Hitler thinks. That is what his people believe, and what the Kaiser's people believed, and it is perfectly natural that they should do so, because it is human nature.

When the finer sensibilities of life are blotted out, and nothing is left but a desire for guns and arms and the destruction of others, one of the things that buoys up a people and builds up their hopes is the feeling that they are destined to rule the world. Hitler dreams of the time when he can do so. So it is with the three other dictators; they dream of the time when their respective countries shall be all-powerful.

How can any one of them attain his ambition, and reach the position which he thinks his people should occupy unless he eliminates the other three? That, I believe will be the salvation of civilization. The one bright hope, it seems to me, is that these dictators, suspicious now of each other, enemies at heart right now, jealous of each other, will fight among themselves. They will have to. In his journey toward the goal to control the world, each dictator will have to cross the path of another dictator seeking likewise to control the world, and when the course of elimination commences and they fight each other there will dawn a brighter day for democracy.

So far the dictators have taken one nation after another, adding them to their domains. That they may eventually come to us, I concede. I concede they would like to conquer the United States. It goes without saying that every one of them would like to do that. But what must they do, Mr. President, before they can conquer us? They must first of all overcome our air force and our Navy. With the large expanse of sea which must be crossed, who thinks for a moment that they could land a single soldier upon American soil, unless they had first destroyed our Navy and our air force? Where are the transports now in all Europe that will bring their men across the ocean? If they know anything, they know enough not to start at the present time. To do so, it seems to me, would be perfectly foolish. I may be wrong in my judgment about that. Perhaps I ought to apologize to Senators who do not agree with my position and who favor the bill when I make the statement that it is perfectly foolish to think that an enemy could land on our shores. I will modify the statement by saying that it seems to me it is foolish to think that such an attempt will be made.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. My attention was called the other day to a speech made by the now Secretary of War, Mr. Stimson. He made it before our entrance into the last war. I have a copy of it in my office which I intend to call to the Senate's attention later on. In that speech, Mr. Stimson predicted, before we got into the last war, that at that particular time, if England and France should lose the war, the Germans could land—I think the figures were—three-hundred-and-ninety-odd-thousand men on the Atlantic seaboard and also 80,000 animals. He predicted that with a force of 390,000 men and 80,000 animals the United States of America could then be captured. He went on to point out that they would first come up the Potomac and take Washington; next they would take Philadelphia and New York City, and then the whole country would collapse. That is the same kind of story we are hearing at the present time. He said that with such a force of 390,000 men and 80,000 animals the Kaiser could take the United States of America.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not think I will have to apologize now when I say I think that idea is foolish; I think it is silly; it is preposterous. What is Hitler doing now with 22 miles of water to cross? He cannot get over to England. Where are the transports to carry his troops. I predict that before he takes England many hundreds of thousands of his soldiers will be at the bottom of the sea, even though he should finally succeed in invading England.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. Yesterday I read in the Washington Star a statement which purports to quote a British officer:

> If an attempted "blitzkrieg" is not launched before then, observers predict it will never come, for when favorable weather returns in the spring the British are determined to seize the advantage.
> "We are not afraid Hitler will try to invade us," one officer commented. "We are afraid he won't."

England is 22 miles away; and yet it has been intimated on the floor of the Senate that Mr. Hitler may come over at any moment and attack the United States. The British are 22 miles away and the British officer is saying, "We are not afraid Hitler will try to invade us. We are afraid he won't."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know who the officer referred to may have been, but if he represents the British Government, and the British are afraid that Hitler will not invade England, why are they going to such desperate lengths to keep him from invading England?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is only fair to say—although I do not remember the exact language quoted by the Senator from Montana—that the British want him to try to invade England.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not what the officer said. He said that the British are afraid he will not try to invade England.

Mr. NORRIS. That is an entirely different thing.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg the Senator's pardon. He did not understand the language. The officer is reported to have said, "We are not afraid Hitler will try to invade us. We are afraid he won't."

In other words, they are afraid Hitler will not try it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I misunderstood the language; but the point is still the same. Of course, there is a difference. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator to go into the possibilities of an invasion of this country; but there is one thing which I think probably makes a difference in the basis of argument and possibility. I presume that as much of the British Navy as is regarded as necessary, or as much as can be concentrated, is concentrated in the English Channel, which is 22 miles wide at the narrowest point.

So the response to any German effort to invade England is concentrated in a small area. If the conditions should resolve themselves in such a way as to afford two oceans, almost from the North Pole to the South Pole, over which any enemy might attack another country, it strikes me that it would present a different situation from that in which the defense is concentrated within a few miles, with the entire force of defense at one place, and not scattered over thousands of miles of territory or water.

Mr. NORRIS. That might be; but if an attempt such as the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Kentucky have been discussing should be made, if by reason of a large expanse of coast we would not know just where the enemy was going to land, I ask the Senator from Kentucky whether or not he thinks Hitler now has transports to carry 100,000 men or 200,000 men to any point on the Atlantic coast, and another transport system to transfer a similar number of men to the Pacific coast, or if the Senator thinks Hitler could come from Germany to either the Pacific coast or the Atlantic coast without our Navy knowing anything about it.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I should not say that. I do not know the strength of the German transport system. I presume it is nothing compared to that of the British.

Mr. NORRIS. It is practically nothing, of course.

Mr. BARKLEY. All this is in the realm of speculation.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think anybody knows in advance what may happen; but if we can conceive of such a situation as that England is defeated and her transport system is taken by the successful aggressor, laying aside her navy—because we see statements in the newspapers that before the British would turn over their navy to the enemy they would sink it or send it to Canada, Australia, or somewhere else—leaving the navy out of it altogether, the German people are highly skilled in the mechanical arts. They are inventive, and they have the mechanical genius which enables them to do things of a mechanical nature probably as successfully and as rapidly as any other nation in the world. Regardless of the outcome of the European war, assuming that at the moment Germany could not transport 100,000 men to the Western Hemisphere, that does not mean that in a year or two, if the Germans saw fit to undertake it, they could not, with their inventive genius, create a transport system which could transport infinitely more than 100,000 men. However, I realize that it would be the business of our Navy not only to know about it in advance, but to do everything possible to prevent it.

However, the point I was undertaking to make was that with such a wide expanse of territory and water it is easier to land on a shore or make an attack than it would be when the operations of both the aggressor and the defenders are concentrated in a small territory.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Kentucky has expressed one idea which I think has much reason in it. He says that, while Hitler probably would not want to attack us right away, in 2 or 3 years he could build up a transport system. What have we provided for in the way of building up our Navy? We have gone far beyond the imagination of most men. We have laid the foundation. The Senator is correct in saying that Hitler would require 2 or 3 years to prepare to attack us. He cannot bring his Army over in rowboats. He has no transport system to fight the waves of the ocean and bring an army over here. Probably his Army would be destroyed or drowned before it could reach our shores. But if Hitler undertakes to build up a transport system, we are building up a navy. I am not trying to prevent it. I voted for it. I think we ought to do it, because that is the way we ought to meet that kind of a tyrant.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not speak as an expert, of course, but merely as a result of common observation. I am sure the Senator realizes that it is possible to build up a transport system of boats to carry soldiers much more readily than to build battleships. We have appropriated enormous sums to build battleships.

Mr. NORRIS. We have a few on hand at the present time.

Mr. BARKLEY. We have a few on hand, yes; but we have not on hand as many as we had 15 years ago.

Mr. NORRIS. We are doing the best we can.

Mr. SCHWARTZ rose.

Mr. BARKLEY. For a period of 12 years not a single battleship was laid down for construction in this country. In the past 7 years 10 have been laid down, and we have appropriated for more. According to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, however—and I think it is an accurate statement supported by the testimony of representatives of the Navy Department—it will be 1946 before those ships are completed and become a part of our Navy.

Mr. NORRIS. By 1946 we shall have a two-ocean Navy.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. By 1946 we shall have a navy greater than any that has ever existed in the history of the world. It will be 1946 before Mr. Hitler will have his navy and his transport system built up sufficiently to come across the Atlantic to attack us. I think that is a conservative statement.

I now yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. The suggestion I desired to make was made by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DONAHEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. DONAHEY. Does the able Senator know any sound economic reason for Nation-wide conscription at the moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not. That question reminds me of what I think I ought to say in answer to the interruption of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. Assume all those things to be true; assume that Hitler can start next week to invade the United States; assume that he can bind all the dictators, and do it within 30 days; what good would the pending bill do to prevent it? Not a bit in the world. If such a thing is going to happen, it would be absolutely useless to pass this bill and expect the working of the bill to prevent it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. It is not going to be a speedy occurrence. Let us not deceive ourselves. The bill provides for compulsory military training in time of peace. If it stays on the statute books, it means that eventually we are to have in the Army every able-bodied man in the United States He is going to be trained. Every child who grows up will be trained. Not a single one will escape. We shall have an army, God knows how big, in time of peace, and the rest of us will be down in the dirt, struggling to make some money to keep that army in existence.

I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] asked if the Senator from Nebraska knew of any economic reason why this bill should pass. Of course, the Senator from Nebraska answered that he did not. It has not been my understanding that the bill is based upon economics.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. Let us eliminate that factor from the question.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not based upon economic need. It is more military than economic. Otherwise, it would not be projected.

I do not want to take the Senator's time, but he is always interesting and always fair. I like to interrupt him, because I get information, and get an honest expression of views; but I shall not do it ad libitum.

Assuming, however, the premise laid down by the Senator, that, if Hitler is coming over here to invade us, this bill cannot prevent it—granting that, for the sake of the argument—does not the Senator think that if he should do that, even though this bill would not prevent him from doing it, we ought to be as well prepared to meet him when he gets here as we possibly can be?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I agree to that; and I think we are.

Mr. BARKLEY. As to that there is a difference of opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. I admit that there is a difference of opinion; but, in my judgment, assuming, as I do not for a moment do, that the direst things that are prophesied by any of the advocates of this bill will happen, assuming that their prophecies will all come true, and that Hitler, Stalin, Mussolini, and Japan are coming over here next week, this bill will not help us at all. If they delay, as the Senator from Kentucky has said, they will have to do, if they have good sense, as, of course, they have, it will take them 2 or 3 years to get ready. In the meantime we have a standing Army of 375,000 men; we have a Navy, probably, as good as any navy in the world today; we have a flying force which is being enlarged. Even if we should embark on war tomorrow, we could enter upon a program of further enlarging our flying force, and increase it rapidly.

What must an enemy army do? First, it must destroy us in the air; second, it must destroy our Navy; third, it must destroy our standing Army and the National Guard, numbering, all told, about 700,000 men. I concede that it is reasonable to assume that these dictators must take some time, but how long will it be after they commence before we can train an army that will be as good as any army in the world? If we train an army today, and get it in fine shape, in 6 months from now it will have retrograded, not because we want it to do so but because that is the way of Nature. It will not be so good after a lapse of time. An army can be trained in a year's time and be made very efficient.

I should like to have such an army, if needed, called out by the selective draft. I am not opposing that method. We adopted it in the World War, and I think it worked well. I think it is fair; I think it is the fairest way to get an army. It divides the burdens up equally among all classes of people who ought to be in the Army. I am not opposing the selective-draft method of raising an army; I am opposing the idea as a permanent proposition to engraft conscription onto our civilization, thus turning the clock back a thousand years. There never will be any possibility afterward when it is finally engrafted on our system of our ever getting out of it except in the way Hitler is going to get out of it.

After such an army has been built up, and many of the young men of the country are in it, and are armed to the teeth, what will happen to the Army? What will happen to us?

What happened in Germany? What is the history of such armies? It is the same everywhere. We will put a chip on our shoulders. Do not get away from the idea that if we have a permanent draft army always standing in arms they will find a way to fight. They will do as armies of dictators have done throughout the history of the world; they will do as Stalin did in the little republics in the Baltic Sea; they will do as Hitler did in Denmark and other countries; they will do as Mussolini did in Ethiopia and Albania. If we have such an army and keep it permanently in time of peace, armed to the teeth those who compose it will know nothing else, especially if the predominant idea is a big army always able to fight. We cannot escape what nature imposes upon all people.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in a moment. There will be inculcated in the minds of those soldiers and of the people at home the idea that they should not take anything from anybody, and the next thing will be to take anything they want from anybody who is not able to defend himself.

Mr. President, it seems to me that if we grant everything advocated by those who favor this bill, their argument falls to the ground. The enactment of the bill would not do any good so far as the present emergency is concerned.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, is it not a fact that this scheme for universal compulsory military service in time of peace has nothing whatever to do with the so-called present emergency?

Mr. NORRIS. Nothing whatever.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But it is an old scheme for the purpose of engrafting a system of universal compulsory military service in time of peace in the United States.

I saw almost identically, though not precisely, the same scheme as that of the so-called Burke-Wadsworth bill, which has been written by Mr. Grenville Clark, as I understand, before I came home from France during the World War. That plan had been prepared at that time by Gen. H. B. Fiske, Assistant Chiel of Staff (G. 5) at the general headquarters. I happened to see this plan in my capacity as a General Staff officer. I was not permitted to have a copy of it; but I was required to initial the draft of the plan as soon as I had read it, and then I sent it back. At that time the Secretary of War did not know anything about any such scheme and did not until I told him about it, and when he found out about it he communicated with General Fiske at sea by wireless while he was on his way home and assigned him to his place in the Regular Army as a major for getting up such a scheme without the consent of the Secretary of War.

The very men who are now sponsoring this scheme—Grenville Clark, Secretary Stimson, Secretary Knox, Col. Julius Ochs Adler, and the whole caboodle of them—have been advocating universal compulsory military service in time of peace since before the World War.

I read a speech not long ago that Secretary Stimson made before we got into the last war advocating universal compulsory military service. The first time I ever saw Frank Knox was at the convention of the American Legion at Minneapolis in 1919, when we sat up all night in the committee on military policy, with Knox struggling against an overwhelming majority of the committee and the Legion to try to commit the Legion then to universal compulsory service in time of peace. This effort was overwhelmingly defeated, and the Legion has never advocated compulsory service in time of peace. Adler and his whole crowd have been always striving to impose such a system, not for an emergency but as a part of the permanent structure of the life of the American people.

Of course, the General Staff of the Army has always been for universal compulsory service, and we cannot blame them for that. The scheme will make colonels out of captains, brigadier generals out of majors, and major generals and lieutenant generals out of colonels. So naturally they are for this scheme. When I say that I mean no reflection on their patriotism; but the point I am trying to make is that this entire proposal at this time has nothing to do with any emergency. It is an effort to take advantage of the hysteria which is now sweeping over the country to engraft this as part of the permanent life of the American people, to let every boy, in his cradle, as the Senator from Nebraska said a few moments ago, be certain that his destiny is to grow up to be a soldier, to be regimented and subjected to the militarism which is repugnant to every American instinct and institution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator reminds me of something I want to say and which I think probably I would have forgotten, had it not been for the interruption. It is that the Army and the Navy naturally want to get a big army and a big navy. We follow them; they are experts; they advise us; but we always have to consider the influences which have been brought to bear upon them and which surround officers of the Army and of the Navy. I do not blame them; I would do the same thing if I had gone into the Army as a young man and lived the life of the Army. I would then think that the Army was the only thing worth having in this life. That, again, is human nature. They are surrounded by influences, morning, noon, and night, which lead them in that direction, and rarely do we find, Mr. President, a high official of the Army who does not want a big army or who does not want compulsory military training in time of peace. These men are honest about it; they are conscientious; but their viewpoint is erroneous. It is not supported by the rank and file of our citizenship. It comes from professional soldiers who went to West Point when they were young and were taught that doctrine all their lives; it is a part of their lives. That circumstance always ought to be taken into consideration when we are considering their testimony. If we create this army and a portion of it is raised, there will be that much additional force trying to convince the people of the country that they ought to go all the way along this road.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BURKE. I was interested in the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri that we could go back before the World War and trace the inception of this proposal that men who may be called upon to fight should be trained for it in time of peace. The Senator from Missouri could go back a great deal further than that—back, indeed, to 1783, and find the recommendations for a peace establishment in this country submitted to Congress by George Washington in which he outlined at great length and in much detail all the essential things which are contained in the pending bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] will not dispute that the record of the almost universal decision and desire of the American people has always and ever been against the principle of compulsory military service in time of peace. The very conception is absolutely repugnant to the system upon which our Government was founded and under which we have lived since the foundation of the Republic.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, during all our national life we have lived under a system which has abhorred compulsory military training in time of peace. That is a part of our nature. We have grown up under a system of that kind. It seems to me it is natural that we should prefer it to a military system which will dominate and control every avenue of our Government and every avenue of the lives of our peace-loving people. Nothing unnatural has happened. Human nature is asserting itself all the time; and here we are undertaking to change the very fundamental principle of our human liberty, upon which our Government was founded and has lived for 150 years, and make it one similar to Hitler's, Stalin's, Mussolini's, and Japan's.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. The junior Senator from Nebraska speaks of George Washington advocating compulsory military training. He was probably one of the most popular and beloved Presidents of the United States. If he advocated it and did not "put it across," it was because the people of the United States would not stand for it; and, so far as I know, no other President has ever dared to propose it to the people of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that in a civilized age we should be able to do some thinking for ourselves. When we can, we should follow the advice of our forefathers and especially of those who are wiser than we. That is proper. We ought to hold their opinions in reverence; but, after all, we have to act.

The responsibility for action is not on George Washington. It is on us. If Senators wish to use George Washington as a witness, that is all right. We ought to consider his evidence, if he has any; but when we come to consider the history of the United States and our people, and we have to decide a question of this kind, we should give it such weight as we think is proper, as a judge always tells a jury, and render our verdict accordingly.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BURKE. I am glad to have my colleague make that statement, because the argument made on the floor of the Senate and in the press and elsewhere against this proposal is that neither a generation ago nor at any other time in the history of the country have we had universal military training in time of peace, and therefore we must not consider it now. I am glad to know that one of the sturdy opponents of this measure says that we are living in a new day, and that we must meet our own problems in our own way.

I should like to say a further word. I recognize, as we all do, that there has been in this country almost universal opposition to what we call militarism; but I think there is very great danger that we may at this time confuse the real meaning of that term. There has been opposition to a large standing army in time of peace, and I think opposition to a large standing army would be almost as strong if it were maintained by voluntary enlistments as it would if compulsion were involved in it, though possibly not so strong. But as against a large standing army in time of peace, which is what we mean by "militarism," this country has set its face; and I think when we search down into the hearts of the people of the country today, or at any time in the past, we shall not find any very general opposition to adequate training in military matters for a sufficient number of our citizens so that they may constitute a real reserve from which a trained army may be drawn in time of need rather than to rely upon a large standing, professional army in time of peace as well as in time of war.

Mr. NORRIS. This bill means a large standing army. The bill means just that, or it is not any good. From my colleague's own standpoint we are going to train everybody. Then we are going to quit training them and send them all back home in order that we may have a citizenry all of whom are trained and from whom we can get an army at a moment's notice.

That is an impossibility. That will not occur. It cannot occur. What is proposed here means compulsory military training today, and tomorrow, and for all time in the future. It means nothing else. It cannot accomplish anything, according to my colleague's own idea, if it does not mean that. We must have this Army all the time, every day; and if we pass this bill, and its provisions are carried out, the Army will be so large that it will stagger the imagination of all of us when we realize its size. It will be with us every day. We will train a portion of our citizens for a year, and then they will go back into private life. We will train another portion of them for a year, and then they will go back into private life. We will train another portion of them for a year, and they will go back to private life. We shall have to be doing that all the time. There is no such thing as training an army today and having it well trained, and 25 years from now, if we do no more training in the meantime, expect to get adequate military service from the men we trained 25 years earlier. That will be an impossibility. In 6 months they will begin to lose a great deal of their ability as soldiers. The advocates of this bill have started something that means an eternity of militarism, nothing else. It cannot mean anything else.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BURKE. The most serious misconception in the minds of those who oppose this measure for selective training in time of peace has just been eloquently expressed by my colleague; that is, that there is anything in the bill which provides for or contemplates a large standing army.

This bill is the very antithesis of that. Under the program as already outlined, Congress willing and making the necessary appropriations, there would be selected on the first of October 400,000 men to go into training. Congress again being willing and providing the necessary money, on the first of next April another 400,000 men would be selected. The men would be trained for 1 year, and then would go back into civil life, being subject only to call for not more than 30 days' service each year to keep them in fit physical condition, and familiar with the latest military tactics. The men would not be made professional soldiers by the fact that for 1 year they were taken out of civil life and given adequate and thorough training in military matters.

Mr. NORRIS. My colleague must realize that I do not want him to take up my time by making a speech. If he has a question he wants to ask me, I shall be glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. BURKE. I was attempting to answer what has been said, but I yield the floor back to my colleague.

Mr. NORRIS. My colleague says this will not be a standing army. Then what will it be? My God! If taking 400,000 men in October and 400,000 men in April and training them for a year in military camps does not mean a standing army, I should like to know what it does mean. If we want to call it by another name, we may do so, but the condemnation of a standing army applies, regardless of what it is called, just as much as though it were called a standing army. We are going to train all the able-bodied men of the United States. We shall be doing it 50 years from now, we shall be doing it 100 years from now, if we carry out the principles of this bill. That is what Germany did, and we see the result. That is what forced conscription does everywhere in any country. It cannot be escaped. It is human nature. We cannot get away from it. Ask the mothers of this country now what they think about it.

I have not said anything about what I believe the people think in regard to this proposal, because I am opposed to it, and I would vote against it if every citizen in my State, from the cradle to old age, came forward and confronted me now and told me I had to vote for it. I would not carry out that kind of a command. I have some responsibility of my own. I would resign, I would quit the service, if they wanted someone to vote differently. I would let them get someone else.

Since what the people say about the matter has been referred to, I wish the proponents of the bill would consult the mothers of the country and ask them what they think of compulsory military service, the women, the patriotic women, who have given birth to boys and raised them to manhood and who love them as they love their own lives. Ask them what they think of compulsory military service in time of peace, if you will. I know what the answer would be. In my opinion, it would be almost unanimous that we should not have it.

Mr. President, let us not for a moment think that in voting on the bill before us we are passing on something which applies only to the present. As I have stated, if we considered everything the advocates of this measure have said in regard to an invasion by foreign countries we would inevitably conclude that the bill would not do one iota of good. It is in fact an effort to engraft upon this country a system of compulsory military training in time of peace which would mean a standing army, which would mean that the remainder of the people, as has been the case in other countries where this policy has been adopted, would have to toil, and work, and drudge, and save to pay the taxes to meet the necessary expenses which our country would have to incur in order to carry out this program.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the able Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Propaganda has gone out that the people are for the bill. I have just read the Gallup poll——

Mr. NORRIS. I read it, too.

Mr. LUNDEEN. The Gallup poll states that Minnesota is 57 percent for the conscription bill and 43 percent against it. That is one of the most fraudulent polls I have ever heard of. I have never had much confidence in the poll anyway, but some folks do. Our correspondence from Minnesota shows 50 to 1, some of it 100 to 1, against this proposal. Anyone can come to my office and examine the telegrams and letters and other communications coming in great numbers. I know that the situation in Minnesota is far different from that pictured by this gentleman who gallops through all the front pages of the press.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I shall not vote by the Gallup poll. I have no objection to the Gallup poll; I have no objection to anyone giving it all the consideration he desires, and I am not criticizing it. I do not believe the last poll is accurate. That is merely my opinion. The Gallup poll may be right and I may be wrong; but if the Gallup poll is right, or if any other similar poll is right, and the people of this country are unanimous for the bill, the people of my State will have to get someone else to carry out their mandate.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. It was heralded from one end of the country to the other a short time ago that the Gallup poll showed 75 percent, I believe, in favor of compulsory military training. But what was the question asked in the first Gallup poll? The question was, "Do you favor military training for the youth of the country between the ages of 18 and 21?" Of course, I might say that I was in favor of military training, but that is quite different from asking, "Do you think that the Government, in time of peace, has a right to conscript the people of this country?" As a matter of fact, if we can do that under the Constitution, then we have a perfect right to conscript wealth and property. How many of the people who are now shouting in favor of conscripting the youth would be howling if someone introduced a bill and proposed "Let the Government take over private property; not merely impose taxes, but take over the property itself"? Either Dr. Gallup himself or those who sent out the questions for the Gallup poll weighted the question which was asked.

Mr. NORRIS. As I have said, so far as the fundamental principle involved in the proposed legislation is concerned, I do not pay any attention to the Gallup poll. I am convinced that if we shall pass the bill we will put this country on a road which means ultimate destruction of democracy, and I am as honest in that belief as any I have ever entertained. I think it is demonstrated by the history of other governments; it follows from what we know of human nature, and in my opinion it would be one of the worst steps we could possibly take. It is contrary to the principles of human freedom and human liberty. It is a complete denial of all the principles underlying any democracy. It cannot stand against reason or logic. It is wrong in principle, it is injurious, and in time will be ruinous to democracy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a copy of a letter I have written to a constituent on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEWART in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULY 23, 1940.

Rev. G. A. MOON,
Minister, Havelock Methodist Church, Lincoln, Nebr.

MY DEAR REVEREND MOON: I am in receipt of your letter in regard to the compulsory military-training bill now pending before a committee of the Senate. I am opposed to this bill and expect to vote against it.

I realize we are confronted at present with world conditions that make a logical argument in favor of the bill, so I realize the question has two sides. I am not questioning in any way the conscientiousness or good faith of those who favor the bill, but I do not believe we are confronted with conditions of such imminent danger as to justify changing the established policy of our Government on this question. During all the years of our history it has been unnecessary to do anything of this kind, and to start in now, at the enormous expense that would be entailed and when, as I see it, there is no proper justification for it, would be both unwise and illogical.

We are not surrounded, as were Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, and Denmark, nations which could be confronted almost on a moment's notice with an army of invasion. Before any nation of Europe could prepare to invade the United States, we would have ample time to prepare and to train a large army, without its being necessary to prepare years in advance. I am speaking now of an army of military men fighting on the ground. It does not apply to the air forces or to the Navy, for instance, which would engage the enemy long before there would be any attempt to land troops on our shores. Before an invasion could be attempted, our Navy and our air force would have to be practically destroyed.

The only possibility of the success of an invading army at the present time, or even in the near future, would be if Hitler succeeded in conquering England and securing the British Navy. By uniting this with his own and with such of the French Navy as Germany might control, added to that of Italy and possibly that of Japan, an attempt might be made to land an invading army. Even that could not possibly succeed, and no sane man, in fact, would attempt it, until after both the air and naval forces of the United States had been destroyed. To begin with, we would have a standing Army of several hundred thousand troops. Our standing Army of 280,000 has recently been increased to 375,000, and that would be a nucleus for the commencement of the training of a greater Army for defense.

To compel our young men to serve in the Army in time of peace is, to me, abhorrent. I do not see the necessity or the reason for it. It is contrary to our history, and, in my opinion, the burden of it would be not only unnecessary, but its enormous annual expense would be so great our people would not sustain such a move. If we were a weak nation, surrounded as the smaller nations of Europe have been, by strong nations with great standing armies and military equipment, the case would be different. Moreover, the continuation of a policy of compulsory military training would gradually change our Nation and the attitude of our people. To a very great extent, they would be drawn gradually but inevitably from their peace-loving ways into those of a nation whose chief object would be to destroy other nations.

The military attitude, for instance, of the people of Germany, where they have had compulsory military training for many, many years, is an illustration of this fact. In that country, men and women are born into an environment of pride in a large, well-equipped, standing army, comprising practically all of the citizenry of the country. Born into such a heritage, the first thing the child sees is uniformed men. The ordinary civilian looks upon the military system as a natural condition, because he knows no other. The soldier in uniform becomes the ideal of the little child in the street. Gradually, as he grows older, he learns to get off the sidewalk when the soldier in uniform goes by.

The highest ambition of all the people would be to train a great army to kill and murder. We, however, have grown up in a different environment. We do not look upon a large standing army or the training of a great body of men as a necessity for our happiness, but if our young men are to be compelled to spend a goodly portion of every year in a military training camp, it would have an effect upon their natures, and, if such a program were carried on for 50 years, the rising generation would know no other ideal except that of military force. We do not live in such an atmosphere, and I pray God we never shall.

In addition, I believe an army of millions of men, supported by a large part of the people, in order that they may wear fine uniforms and devote their entire time, energies, ambitions, and abilities to military tactics, would mean in the end that we would get into war. It is but natural in such a case that we would disregard and eventually forget the finer instincts of humanity that make men and women peaceful and peace-loving, that cause them to love their fellow men, even those of other nations. The result would be, we would have a great class of citizens who, instead of being peaceful citizens, pursuing the ways of peace, would be armed to the teeth, ready to quarrel or fight at the drop of the hat, and continually we would be at war somewhere, with somebody. Our international troubles and difficulties would be greatly increased, if the majority of our people were armed soldiers. It is true with a nation as it is with men. We would become a bully upon the international field, not only willing to fight, but hunting for a fight. We would be continually finding fault with everybody and everything. Our Nation, figuratively speaking, would carry a chip on each shoulder all of the time.

It does not take a lifetime to train a soldier to fight. The American soldiers in the World War, it is admitted, after a training in many cases of but a few months, were able to compete in all respects with the men who had been trained for a lifetime. Compulsory military training in this country means that at all times we would have millions of men under arms. If that is not provided for in the initial bill, it will follow soon afterward. So the people who are not of military age would to a very great extent be spending all their energies and efforts to pay for the taking care of millions of other men who did nothing but prepare for war.

I believe such a law, if carried on for several years would change the very nature of most of our citizens. We would become warlike, and when we had become warlike, there would be no doubt but that we would soon be fighting with somebody.

I have been voting for great appropriations for an increased air force, an increased standing army, and a greater navy. I have voted for amounts so great that, years ago, the very thought of them would have frightened me. I have done it, because of the new methods of recent warfare, the inhuman methods, the dominant methods, the methods which control the four greatest dictator countries on earth. It has all been against my wish and my will, but, faced with these facts, I am compelled, I believe, to favor what I believe to be ample preparation for any emergency that may arise in the future. Feeling as I do and believing as I do, I cannot see my way clear to vote for compulsory military training.

With best wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, during the course of his remarks I interrupted the Senator from Nebraska and quoted Secretary Stimson. In order to be perfectly correct, I wish to say that the quotation was from a speech entitled "The Issues of the War," by Henry L. Stimson, issued by the National Security League, 31 Pine Street, New York. While the speech is not dated, I take it from the context that it was delivered before our entry into the World War, because he was talking about what we should do. In that speech he said we should both give money and send men. But I wish to call particular attention to this statement in his speech:

There is on file in the War College at Washington a document which has a direct bearing on this subject. It contains the calculations of our General Staff showing what Germany could do in such a contingency as that. It shows that, with her merchant marine as it was in 1914, within 16 days after obtaining control of the sea, she could land upon our coast a force of 387,000 men and 81,000 animals, together with all the necessary arms and equipment for an invasion. It shows that in 30 days more that could be followed by a still larger expedition. And there has been recently published a letter of the late Admiral of our Navy—George Dewey—showing that there are very few places on our eastern coast—from Maine to Virginia—where such an expedition could not land with perfect ease.

In the path of such an invasion would lie the American Fleet. Ten years ago our fleet was larger and stronger than that of Germany. But we learn now, on the potent authority of Admiral Fiske, that even by 1914 the German Fleet had grown until it was twice as strong as our own and that during the war its construction has been progressing under pressure, while ours has been virtually standing still. We also know that the German Fleet is manned by veterans and that our fleet is today short some 40,000 men. In the face of such figures can anyone say that prompt control of the sea against us by Germany would not be a mathematical probability?

Ah, but someone says, what nonsense. Neither Germany nor any foreign nation would be foolish enough to try to conquer so large a territory as the United States. Maj. Eric Wood, of the Reserve Corps, tells how, during the autumn of 1914, he made just such a statement to an officer of the German staff in Berlin. The German looked at him and quietly replied:

"It is true that your country is very large, but its heart is very small and very vulnerable, and you must remember, my friend, that in nations, as in individuals, the body falls if the heart is struck."

Further the Secretary of War stated:

Turning to an atlas he traced a line upon it which began at the mouth of the Chesapeake, ran thence up that waterway, up the Potomac River to its upper reaches, then across country through Maryland and Pennsylvania to Harrisburg, then along the Susquehanna to near Scranton, then across to Kingston, N. Y., and by way of the Hudson, Lake George, and Lake Champlain to Canada. That makes a line not much longer than the line which the Germans hold in France today. East of it lies a territory only half as large as what Germany holds of Russia today. In that strip of territory lie the National Capital, the capitals of 11 States, our largest and richest cities, and nearly all our munition plants, besides 25,000,000 people. It embraces all the termini of our transcontinental railroads. It contains the political and commercial capitals of the country and a very large percentage of its manufactories. Should this country be invaded today, it would be the work of but a few weeks to seize that line and, once seized, it would be a far easier line to hold than the line which the Germans are now holding in France. The line in France has no natural barriers to make it defensive. The line in America has the great barriers of the Chesapeake, the Potomac, the Susquehanna, the Hudson, Lake Champlain, and Lake George. Once fortified, it could be held against our best efforts by a comparatively small force of German veterans.

The man who made that statement is now telling us what we ought to do with reference to conscription. He is the man whose word we in the Senate of the United States are now supposed to heed.

Mr. President, I submit that any man who in 1917 made a speech in which he said that 390,000 enemy soldiers together with 80,000 animals could in 16 days be transported across the Atlantic Ocean and landed on our shores, is not fit to be Secretary of War, and it seems to me that his judgment is not worthy of being followed by the Senate of the United States.

Now he again has taken a position, and he advocates a conscription bill. In 1917 he did not go so far as he does now in connection with his advocacy of the conscription bill. He then took in compartively few of the youth of the country. At that time he said:

The Chamberlain bill proposes a training period of 6 months for the youth of this country. In that respect it follows the conclusions of the General Staff embodied in a careful report in 1912, in which it was stated that, assuming competent instructions and a proper staff organization, such a period would be sufficient to create a respectable army.

When the war hysteria seized the country there was talk first of conscripting all the men of the country and training them, but since public spirit has been aroused, it is proposed to cut down the number, and now the talk is of training men from 21 to 30 years of age, not for a 6-month period, as previously advocated by Mr. Stimson, but for 1 year. Then, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] pointed out, those men who have had training for a period of a year will go into the Reserves, and may be called back for further training from time to time during the next 15 years. So, as a matter of fact, what is proposed to be done is to set up a permanent military organization.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated. The purpose of the amendment is to raise the base pay of soldiers in accordance with the Army recommendations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the committee amendment it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. —. (a) The monthly base pay of enlisted men of the Army shall be as follows: Enlisted men of the first grade, $126; enlisted men of the second grade, $84; enlisted men of the third grade, $72; enlisted men of the fourth grade, $60; enlisted men of the fifth grade, $54; enlisted men of the sixth grade, $36; enlisted men of the seventh grade, $30; except that the monthly base pay of enlisted men with less than 4 months' service during their first enlistment period and of enlisted men of the seventh grade whose inefficiency or other unfitness has been determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, shall be $21. The pay for specialists' ratings, which shall be in addition to monthly base pay, shall be as follows: First class, $30; second class, $25; third class, $20; fourth class, $15; fifth class, $6; sixth class, $3. Enlisted men of the Army shall receive, as a permanent addition to their pay, an increase of 10 percent of their base pay and pay for specialists' ratings upon completion of the first 4 years of service, and an additional increase of 5 percent of such base pay and pay for specialists' ratings for each 4 years of service thereafter, but the total of such increases shall not exceed 25 percent.

(b) The pay for specialists' rating received by an enlisted man of the Army at the time of his retirement shall be included in the computation of his retired pay.

(c) The pay of enlisted men of the sixth grade of the National Guard for each armory drill period, and for each day of participation in exercises under sections 94, 97, and 99 of the National Defense Act, shall be $1.20.

(d) No back pay or allowances shall accrue by reason of this act for any period prior to the date of its enactment.

(e) Nothing in this act shall operate to reduce the pay now being received by any retired enlisted man.

(f) The provisions of this section shall be effective during the period September 1, 1940, to May 15, 1945. During such period all laws and parts of laws insofar as the same are inconsistent herewith or in conflict with the provisions hereof are hereby suspended.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, the amendment is in accordance with a recommendation which was made by the War Department. A hearing was had on Senate bill 2224, which was introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. Capt. Ira Swift, of the War Department General Staff, and others, gave testimony in support of the measure. It was drawn by them and recommended by them.

The bill raises the pay in line with the pay of sailors.

There are three increases in the lower-pay schedules. It raises the one from $21 to $30 a month.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. Permit me to complete my statement. It raises the next one above that from $42 to $52, and the one above that from $54 to $60.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The increase from $21 to $30 would simply put enlisted men of the Army in the same status as those of the Navy have had for many years?

Mr. LEE. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I was never able to see any rhyme or reason for enlisted men in the Navy getting more pay than those in the Army to begin with.

Mr. LEE. Nor could I.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have had a bill pending along this line for 2 or 3 years.

Mr. LEE. The bill to which I refer is the bill introduced by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am very favorable to the proposal. So far as I am concerned I am in favor of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma to the committee amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, is the Chair putting the question on the amendment just presented by the Senator from Oklahoma?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think we ought to have a quorum call before that is done or else have a general discussion of the subject now.

CAMPAIGN TEXTBOOKS

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I seek recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to be recognized on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HATCH. I desire to be recognized. I wish to speak on the amendment just offered. I think I am in hearty accord with its purpose. But certainly before an important amendment of that kind is adopted there should be a quorum call and Senators should be apprised of the nature of the amendment.

Mr. President, I did not rise, however, to speak on that amendment, nor on the bill today. I dislike to take the time of the Senate from matters of legislation under discussion, notwithstanding the fact that that is the common rule and practice of the Senate.

A week ago today I took the floor to criticize and condemn what I thought was, and what I characterized as, an open, flagrant violation, or rather evasion of the bill Congress recently passed, as well as the one it passed last year, relating to political activities. In that instance I criticized and condemned a flagrant evasion of the terms of the bill relating to campaign contributions as laid down and expressed in the opinion of Mr. Fletcher, general counsel for the Republican National Committee. I did not hesitate to say that I thought the scheme was vicious and bad, and was destructive of the principle and intent of the law. I am of the same opinion today.

But, Mr. President, over the week end there has developed another situation. In fairness I feel compelled today to take the same attitude I took 1 week ago today, except that on this occasion my criticism goes to the actions of the committee of my own party, the Democratic National Committee, with reference to the so-called convention book.

I had heard about that book for some time. I knew about the instance of the last campaign, in 1936. I had hoped that would not be repeated in this campaign. I read in the press the statements made by members of the committee as to the reasons for the publication and sale of the campaign book this year; and I say now, Mr. President, that I think what the national committee of my own party is doing today, or proposing to do, with the publication and sale of the convention book, amounts to just as much of an evasion of the law, an evasion of its principle and purpose, as the plan which Mr. Fletcher conceived, and which I denounced last week.

Every word I used in denunciation of the plan proposed by Mr. Fletcher I use today in connection with the Democratic convention book. I wish to point out, Mr. President, exactly where the vice in the sale of the convention book lies.

I think probably it is entirely correct, from the standpoint of strict legal construction, that advertising which had been contracted for and paid for before the book was published is probably not a technical violation of the act. The contracts having been made before the act became effective, and being completed transactions, a law reaching backward would probably be in the nature of an ex post facto law. So, technically, that contention may be correct. So far as the so-called Hatch law is concerned, such advertising may not be a violation of the provisions of that particular law. However, last week I said that I did not care about the technical construction placed upon the act by Mr. Fletcher and his committee. This week I do not care about the technical construction placed upon the act by members of my own party. If it is bad in the one case, it is bad in the other. Even though the advertising in the convention may be technically legal under the so-called Hatch Act, in my opinion it clearly amounts to an evasion, if not a violation, of the Corrupt Practices Act, insofar as advertising was solicited from corporations, and corporations paid for advertising in the convention book.

I know the terms of the Corrupt Practices Act. I have it before me. I know that it relates only to contributions. Corporations are forbidden to make contributions to campaigns; and, again, technically there may be no violation of that law, because the corporation buys advertising space. But I say, as I said about Mr. Fletcher's plan, that it is an evasion of the law, because no corporation will buy advertising space in a campaign book for its value from an advertising standpoint. In my judgment, it amounts to at least an indirect contribution to the campaign fund and an evasion of the Corrupt Practices Act. So much for that.

I do not wish to talk long on this occasion. I merely wish to make clear and definite the fact that I do not apply to the Republican Party a rule which I do not also apply to the Democratic Party. However, at this time I wish to mention particularly the exact conditions of the sale or distribution of the book.

It was said that the national committee proposes to sell the book for 25 cents a copy. The proceeds of the sale naturally—it could not be otherwise—would inure to the benefit of the Democratic National Committee and the candidates on the Democratic ticket. As Attorney General Jackson pointed out, unfortunately the sale is not prohibited; but the buying is prohibited, whether the sale is made directly by the Democratic National Committee, or indirectly, through State and local committees, as is suggested in one news dispatch on my desk, wherein it is said the national committee does not propose to sell the books itself, but to send them to State and county committees and let them sell them for a price not to exceed 25 cents. Possibly, so far as the selling agency is concerned, such a transaction would be strictly legal. However, every person who bought the book would be violating a criminal statute enacted by the Congress.

The Corrupt Practices Act provides that:

> It is further declared to be a pernicious political activity, and it shall hereafter be unlawful for any person, individual, partnership, committee, association, corporation, and any other organization or group of persons, to purchase or buy any goods, commodities, advertising, or articles of any kind or description where the proceeds of such a purchase, or any portion thereof, shall directly or indirectly inure to the benefit of or for any candidate for an elective Federal office (including the offices of President of the United States and Presidential and Vice Presidential electors) or any political committee or other political organization engaged in furthering, advancing, or advocating the nomination or election of any candidate for any such office or the success of any national political party: Provided, That nothing in this sentence shall be construed to interfere with the usual and known business, trade, or profession of any candidate.

So I say, Mr. President, that whether a sale is made by the national committee, by a State committee, or by a local or county committee, every person who buys one of the books is violating that provision of the law. I do not think the national committee of my party or any other party wants to sponsor sales which subject the purchasers to penalties consisting of fines of as much as $5,000 or 5 years in the penitentiary.

There is but one thing to do about the convention book, Mr. President. Regardless of what the cost may be, or what effect it may have, it should be discontinued at once. Last week I said to the Republican National Committee, "Obey the spirit as well as the letter of the law." This week I say to the Democratic National Committee, "Obey the spirit as well as the letter of the law."

In that connection, Mr. President, while I shall not take time to read it, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a very fine statement on respect for law, made many years ago by one of the greatest Americans who ever lived—Abraham Lincoln.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> The question recurs, "How shall we fortify against?" The answer is simple. Let every American, every lover of liberty, every well-wisher to his posterity, swear by the blood of the Revolution never to violate in the least particular the laws of the country, and never to tolerate their violation by others. As the patriots of '76 did to the support of the Declaration of Independence, so to the Constitution and laws let every American pledge his life, his property, and his sacred honor—let every man remember that to violate the law is to trample on the blood of his father, and to tear the charter of his own and his children's liberty. Let reverence for the laws be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in schools, in seminaries, and in colleges; let it be written in primers, spelling books, and in almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in legislative halls, and enforced in courts of justice. And in short, let it become the political religion of the Nation; and let the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the grave and gay, of all sexes and tongues and colors and conditions, sacrifice unceasingly upon its altars.
> While ever a state of feeling such as this shall universally or even very generally prevail throughout the Nation, vain will be every effort and fruitless every attempt, to subvert our national freedom. (A. Lincoln address before the Young Men's Lyceum, Springfield, Ill., January 27, 1837.)

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, before the absence of a quorum is suggested, I wish to make a brief comment on the observations just submitted by the able Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH].

The Senator's observations this morning, demonstrating the ability, courage, independence, and impartiality with which he insists upon the ethics and the equity of the act which bears his name, are a simple demonstration of the reason why he holds so completely the confidence of his colleagues and of the country.

Mr. HATCH. Of course, I wish to express my thanks to the Senator from Michigan for his very kind remarks. Somebody else said that it would take courage to make this criticism today. I do not think so. After my statement of last week, I think it would have been extremely unfair not to have made the statement which I made today. It required only fairness and impartiality.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am sure that is the estimate the Senator placed upon the obligation which he confronted. Nevertheless, there are many who, in similar circumstances, would have found a reason to be absent. I renew my compliment to the Senator from New Mexico.

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service.

Mr. VANDENBERG obtained the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators having responded to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I am opposed to the peacetime conscription of American youth power unless it is reasonably established that a positive national emergency can be served and saved in no other way. I am opposed to tearing up 150 years of American history and tradition, in which none but volunteers have entered the peacetime Armies and Navies of the United States, unless there is valid reason, to believe that this reliance in 1940 has become a broken reed for the first time in a century and a half.

There must have been sound reasons all down the years why our predecessors in the Congress always consistently and relentlessly shunned this thing which we are now asked to do. These reasons must have been related in some indispensable fashion to the fundamental theory that peacetime military conscription is repugnant to the spirit of democracy and the soul of Republican institutions, and that it leads in dark directions. That certainly is my view.

Those who tell me, in this so-called emergent hour, that we dare not think of this long background which is our inheritance leave me cold. The very conditions which the world confronts today—the ruthless destruction of personal liberty under a dozen flags, the rape of civil freedom to the west and to the east, the challenge in behalf of civilization which are urged in justification of this apostasy—all these really are reasons why we should be doubly jealous of the American way of life, rather than being excuses why we should hastily abandon it.

I may be supersensitive upon this score, Mr. President, but I cannot escape the deep conviction that when we inject the military regimentations of peacetime conscription into the life of this Nation we wrench from it a precious possession with which we should not lightly part.

We set a military-minded precedent—a precedent in regimenting human life and action—which invites dangerous expansion and which may permanently afflict and alter the character of our institutions. Such a revolutionary change, even though a majority may be persuaded of its need and wisdom, is not to be lightly made.

That explains the solemn feelings which move me into this debate.

Now let me hasten to say that I do not discount the bitter fact that grave menace is loose in the world today, that it deals with grim realities, and that those who collide with it need something more substantial than history and tradition or any other spiritual values with which to defend themselves. Yet spiritual values are still priceless things.

The degree of our exposure, still protected as we are by two God-given oceans, may be a matter of dispute, as it may also be related to the provocative extent of the foreign policies which we may pursue. I am one of those who most emphatically believe that war for us is not inevitable unless we ourselves needlessly make it inevitable. Yet I am also one of those who believe that we dare not lean upon any speculative immunities, nor upon any wishful thinking. Barring surrender to wholly irrational hysteria, we must prepare for the worst. Therefore, with one or two inconsequential exceptions, I have voted for every appropriation which the Army or the Navy has sought, not only in the recent months' pell-mell defense legislation but also throughout the last 7 years. I have voted to authorize the President to mobilize the National Guard and all our component reserves, because that is the logical step, the historic and traditional step, according to the American way in the presence of emergency. I unequivocally accept the axiom that our expanding national-defense equipment must be matched with the paralleling expansion of our national-defense personnel, competently matched and matched in fully ample time. Thus far I have no disagreement with the proponents of a conscript army and a conscript navy when the emergency is established.

But beyond this point, Mr. President, the issue sharply rises, and with it rises the dire question whether these facts and these necessities have made it plain to us that we may no longer safely lean upon the historic and traditional American peacetime method of volunteer enlistments for the national defense, or whether the fateful time has now come, in 1940, when the American way, from 1787 to 1939, must be abandoned, and with it one of the glorious trade-marks of our democracy.

The controlling consideration is a simple one. It involves authentic answer, so far as I am concerned, to this one plain question which I submit to the Senate; the question upon which my entire discussion hangs, and upon which I think the decision ought to hang. This is the question: Has the volunteer system, under adequate trial, demonstrated that it cannot be trusted to produce the recruits required by the Army and the Navy as swiftly as may be needed fully to match and man our new facilities for the defense of America and her essential outposts?

If and when the justified answer is "Yes," I will vote for peacetime conscription. So long as the justified answer is "No," I will not vote for peacetime conscription. That is the proposition I wish to discuss. Such a position cannot be inimical to the national defense, because it proposes completely and adequately to implement the national defense in one way or the other.

Even though President Roosevelt now endorses conscription in general terms, and even though he went so far on June 18 as to suggest the idea of compulsory Government service for all young American men and women to aid the national defense, my position does not differ from the sentiment attributed to the President on the floor of the House of Representatives by Representative SABATH on August 5, who said:

> He (the President) favors a draft only if sufficient men cannot be obtained for the Army and the Navy through voluntary enlistment.

Indeed, Representative SABATH was so violently critical of the Burke-Wadsworth bill that he called it "nothing but a Republican scheme to smear the President and the administration." I really doubt if we are that cunning, that subtle, or that malevolent. The final attitudes of all concerned may be allowed to speak for themselves. I repeat that the position I define cannot be inimical to the national defense, because it proposes completely and adequately to implement the national defense either by the voluntary system, or, if it defaults, by the conscript system.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. Representative SABATH is the chairman of the Rules Committee of the House, is he not?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. WHEELER. And one of the Democratic leaders who is generally recognized as a spokesman for the administration?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I assume that is so.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BURKE. The Senator from Michigan has asked a specific question, or stated the case for and against this bill in a very definite and proper way. If, by the time-honored method of volunteer enlistment, we cannot secure the necessary manpower for our greatly increased war machine, the Senator is willing that we should go beyond that, and, by some method of compulsion, bring men into the service.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. BURKE. But he is not willing to take the second step until the first shall have been demonstrated as impossible of accomplishment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. BURKE. I rise only to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the bill now before the Senate there is a specific provision authorizing the continuance of volunteer enlistment for all men between the ages of 18 and 35, and at the same time going ahead with the provision for the selective compulsory requirement—the draft, if you will—and in all seriousness I ask the Senator from Michigan whether he and those who share his view should not be entirely satisfied by this provision: Voluntary enlistment provided for in the bill if the requisite number of men come forward of their own free will; and those who are charged with the authority of saying what that number is say that it must be 400,000 by October 1. If that number comes forward, there will be no selection made on October 1. On April 1 of next year——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand the Senator's question, and I shall be glad to answer it. I do not think it is necessary to enlarge upon it indefinitely.

Mr. BURKE. If the Senator is in a hurry to complete his remarks, I will desist.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; I do not want to be diverted unduly. The Senator has asked a perfectly fair question, and he is entitled to a perfectly frank answer. I had intended to reach that subject a little later, but I will answer the question now for the time being.

The difference between the Senator and me is this: The Senator proposes to set up the entire machine of conscription, he proposes to write the conscript principle into American practice, regardless of whether the volunteer system succeeds or not, and in advance of any determination that this infamous thing is necessary—and it is infamous if it is unnecessary. The Senator is proposing to establish a great system of draft boards across the country, 200,000 civilian bureaucrats who will be in control of the life and livelihood of every young man from 21 to 31, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Lakes to the Gulf. He is proposing to erect that system of compulsory military bureaucracy in advance of a determination whether or not it is necessary to use it, under the theory of the thing which he now presents to me.

The difference between the Senator and me is simply this fundamental difference: I decline to take this step until the proof of its necessity is apparent. The Senator proposes to take it immediately, regardless of any such proof, and therefore to put the prospective volunteer under the shotgun impulse of volunteering because otherwise he may be drafted later. I think that is a very great difference between us.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BURKE. The Senator declares that the principle of compulsory selective training or service in time of peace is infamous. Let that pass.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BURKE. There is——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Wait a minute; let me interrupt the Senator. I said it was infamous if it was perpetuated needlessly.

Mr. BURKE. All right.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If it has to be done, it is just as honorable as any other system that could be applied.

Mr. BURKE. All right. With the qualifications stated by the Senator, this proposal to train our men in order that they may be able adequately to take their part in a national-defense system is infamous. I say, let that pass. There is one thing more infamous than such a proposal, even if we were to admit the Senator's allegation, and that would be for us to get into a position where we required manpower and had to rely upon ill-trained and improperly trained manpower.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. BURKE. I do not think we can properly wait to see whether, by some great ballyhoo and recruiting encouragement, with bands and white feathers and everything else, we can get the requisite number by volunteer enlistment. I think the sane, sensible, proper thing to do is to proceed right now to apply the just, democratic principle of selection.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I know the Senator does, and he believes in it profoundly and conscientiously, and I completely respect his view and his sincerity. I do not want him to put any words in my mouth. I had no meaning to attach the word "infamous" to the service itself. I say that the infamous thing would be the act of a Congress which deserts the volunteer system needlessly and goes to the conscript system. There is nothing infamous about the draft if and when it has to be applied. There is no finer or more honorable story in the history of the United States than the story of the service rendered under the draft in the World War. The Senator must not attempt to impute to me the thought that I am trying to deprecate or depreciate the high standard and qualiy of service under a draft law. That is the remotest thing from my mind. When I used the word "infamous" I was applying it to the congressional act which might needlessly, in the lack of proofs of its necessity, desert the voluntary system and precipitate the draft system.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The word "infamous" is an ugly word.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; I think it is; and I will withdraw it. I do not think it is infamous.

Mr. BARKLEY. And it carries with it many implications.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator contend that in this particular instance, any more than any other in which Congress exercises its judgment, although it might be mistaken in its judgment, the fact that it does an unnecessary thing renders it infamous any more than if we should levy a tax that was unnecessary?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has not been here. He has just entered the Chamber, and he has not heard what I have said.

Mr. BARKLEY. I heard what the Senator said about "infamous."

Mr. VANDENBERG. Very well. The Senator has not heard me lay down the basis of my deep feeling that it is a terrible thing for the United States to depart from 150 years of peacetime history and tradition in respect to compulsory military service; and I feel utterly deeply about the character of the error that Congress would make if it should needlessly depart from the volunteer system. I think the word "infamous," as the Senator from Kentucky properly indicates, has connotations and implications which I did not remotely have in my mind.

I was attempting to define what I believed to be the utterly terrific nature of the responsibility which we are exercising. The last thing in the world that I would wish to inject into the debate, as I am about to say in just a few moments, would be the remotest suspicion of a complaint against the motives or the attitude of any man on either side of this question, because I think one of the serious things involved in this discussion, particularly in the country, is the growing habit of insisting that the attitude of the man who does not believe with one has some sinister purpose or reason behind it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate that, Mr. President, and I pay tribute to the Senator from Michigan for his utter sincerity. I have no doubt, and have never questioned the fact, that he has profound convictions upon this subject, and I do not intend to get into any colloquy here which could lead on either side to any questioning of motives. But the Senator realizes that in tomorrow morning's paper the headline will probably be carried that the Senator from Michigan denounced this proposal as "infamous," and to the average American citizen the word "infamous" carries with it implications and connotations which automatically, to the unthinking, those who are not able to distinguish between definitions of words, means that whatever we might do, however honest we might be, however we might be mistaken, carries with it the infamy of imputed wrong, which I think no one should impute or charge in this Chamber.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator understands my attitude and my feeling about the matter, and as I proceed

I will make it still plainer that I think the decision involves considerations so utterly fundamental in respect to the American system and in respect to the life of the Republic that almost any word appropriately applied could scarcely do justice to my feelings about a description of the mistake Congress would make if it should pass the pending measure in its present form at the present time.

Now I shall continue. I repeat, the position I define cannot be inimical to the national defense because it proposes completely and adequately to implement the national defense either on the one hand by the voluntary system or if, as, and when the voluntary system fails, then by conscription. It simply prefers volunteers to conscripts. It simply prefers history to hysteria. It simply prefers peacetime methods in peace to wartime methods in peace. It simply prefers liberty of action to regimentation. It prefers freedom to force. It prefers democracy to dictation.

It is the same position taken by Raymond J. Kelly, national commander of the American Legion, when he says:

> The provisions of the Burke-Wadsworth bill should not be put into effect until all other avenues have been exhausted.

Then Commander Kelly pertinently adds:

> We are not at war, although everything being done seems to be based on the theory that we are, or that we will be any minute.

Mr. President, before going further with my theme I wish to turn for a moment from pursuit of the question I have posed to one or two general comments upon this whole situation. Let me respectfully say that I think it is deeply unfortunate that this and kindred issues have precipitated a tide of vast intolerance across the country. Motives and purposes are impugned wholly without reason. It is, of course, a familiar phenomenon in tense moments of great feeling, but in its climax it flames and flares in ugliest injustice.

Reading some of my mail, one could believe that any proconscriptionist is either a "fifth columnist" for King George or some incarnate devil bent upon swiftly subverting the Republic. Reading other sections of my mail, one could believe that any anticonscriptionist is either a "fifth columnist" for Hitler or a supine appeaser or a self-immolated ostrich. These things simply are not so. Patriotic men and women who deeply love their country are conscientiously devoted to the belief that the time has come to draft. I completely respect their opinions, although I completely disagree with them. Just as patriotic men and women who just as deeply love their country are conscientiously devoted to the belief that the time has not come to draft. Their opinions are entitled to the same respect.

Indeed, as I run through 50,000 earnest letters against the draft which have come to me, obviously from the troubled hearts of good men and good women who are speaking out of their anxiety and their simple convictions and their doubts and their perplexities, I am moved to observe that the commentator who dismisses them all with the contemptuous assertion they are just ignorant victims of subversive propaganda is nothing short of brutal in his cruel error.

Mr. President, I pray that we may remember this is still a land of free speech and free thought and free petition, and even though we may be writing one form of unprecedented and unwelcome compulsion into our institutions with this bill, that we still shall wish to preserve freedom of opinion and the mutual tolerance without which it cannot survive.

I wish to refer to one other thing before I return to my question. We have here a magnificent example of the value and the virtue of full and free discussion ahead of decisions upon important public problems, and the corresponding danger of impatient, impulsive legislative haste. Even the preliminary debates upon the Burke-Wadsworth bill, and the reactions of the country to these debates, have already produced a profound change in the original text. Even if we get no further, the battle already has justified itself, and a substantial victory for reason has been won. The Senate Committee on Military Affairs has already ameliorated some of the major challenges which were originally contemplated. The bill no longer demands registration of all men, virtually from the cradle to the grave, 42,000,000 of them, who would have been drawn into the shadow of impressment. Its appetite is now, relatively, greatly constrained. The bill no longer asserts that peacetime military service must be shared by all, a concept which would have changed the spiritual dedications of our people.

The bill no longer proposes to reduce the soldier's meager pay from its present pittance to a petty gratuity unworthy of America, and certainly unworthy of a Congress just about to rewrite the tax laws so as to permit wider latitude for capital.

Meanwhile, the bill now includes a new provision, which promises some degree of protection to the young man whom the peacetime draft ruthlessly yanks out of the job in which he hopes to make a career. It tries to say that he shall have his job back when his Government is finished with his services, and this compulsory draft is done. I hope it is more than a pious platitude which will be more honored in its breach than in its performance. At any rate, it is a thoroughly human thing, and it shows that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs appreciates that this peacetime conscription is shot through with economic hazard to the generation just entering upon life's stage.

The bill now also includes a provision for voluntary enlistments on a 1-year basis, preliminary to the draft, the thing which I was discussing a few moments ago in my colloquy with the able Senator from Nebraska. This, too, is a worthy concession to a noble and traditional American ideal, and it certainly is far better than no concession at all. But, unfortunately, it is what might be termed a shotgun concession, or, using the current language of one of my friends, a stiletto concession, because it virtually says to young America: "We'll draft you unless ———."

Nevertheless, in respect to all of these things I wish to make the point that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs has wholesomely tried to meet the rising storm of national objection to a peacetime draft, and it has done the best it could so long as it proposes to cling to what I believe to be its fundamental fallacy.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield in a moment. I wish to make the point that if the bill had been jammed through on the spur of a white-hot moment, as seemed to be the imminent prospect two or three weeks ago, it would have lacked the judicial tempering which a little debate and a little deliberation have already contributed to it.

I now yield to my able friend from Nebraska.

Mr. BURKE. The Senator complained somewhat of the provision in the bill for voluntary enlistment for 1 year, and the possibility of an increase in pay, on the ground, as I understand—and I do not wish to put words in the Senator's mouth which have not come from him—that that amounts to saying to the young men of the country, "We will draft you, unless ——"; and of course that is true; that is the whole purpose of it.

The question I wish to ask is: How does that differ from the proposal which the Senator advocates, which would be to hold the matter of enlistment open, with the threat or the promise, whichever way one wants to look at it, that if by January 1, or some other date, the enlistments do not come in, then the draft may be applied?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is the same question the Senator previously asked me, and I give him the same answer. In the form in which the Senator proposes to proceed he is putting the volunteer system under the suspicion that it is likely to fail. He is anticipating failure by establishing a substitute in advance without waiting for its failure. I repeat, he is tearing up 150 years of peacetime history, and precipitating compulsory peacetime service before he knows whether or not it will be necessary. The difference between us is the fundamental one that I do not want the Congress to commit itself to a principle which I consider to be repugnant to the American way of life, unless and until it is obvious and evident that there is absolutely no other way by which we can adequately prepare.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BURKE. It would appear to me that the difference between the two proposals is simply whether we want efficiency or do not want it. Under the one system we say "Come forward and enlist in the number required to perfect the national defense." But meanwhile, in order to be efficient, and save time, which is of the essence of this matter, we are setting up the machinery to take care of the situation if there are not a sufficient number of enlistments.

The other view is, "Well, we will just take a chance on it. We hope that there will be a sufficient number of enlistments. We do not know, and we will take no steps now to take care of the situation if the volunteers do not come forward in sufficient number."

That, it seems to me, is the real difference between the two proposals.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator's idea of efficiency and mine are different. The Senator's idea of efficiency, as now presented, is that he would establish this tremendous bureaucracy of a draft board in every county of America, perhaps 200,000 persons in all, put it in motion, finance it, prepare it for its labors, and then, if he found that he could still get volunteers, he would demobilize the draft boards, and incur all that expense with no result.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Am I to understand the Senator to say that he favors trying out the volunteer system first, and then if that does not result in getting a sufficient number of troops, use the draft method? Is that the Senator's attitude?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Oh, that is it in a short form.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would the Senator then, if he did not get them by voluntary enlistment, draft men?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I tried to make that plain.

Mr. CONNALLY. Well, why?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator who is questioning me completely agree as to the existence of the necessity for the extension of our defense personnel?

Mr. CONNALLY. If I did not I would not have voted for all the defense measures for which I have voted.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Neither would I. The whole question is the difference as to how the expanded personnel shall be obtained, and I think I shall be able in a few moments to make my position plainer to the Senator, if I have failed thus far.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the proposed method is all wrong, if it will tear at the heart of all our institutions, then I do not see how anyone can vote for it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Because everything is relative in life, and there are some things even worse than that; and one of them would be to be unequal to the challenge which we might confront one of these days.

Mr. CONNALLY. I always enjoy hearing the Senator from Michigan.

Let me ask him another question. We admit the necessity. We need the men. We say, "Come on boys, volunteer. We are going to have a rally tonight. We are going to have a speech. We are going to have a brass band out. We are going to have a lot of girls there with bunting and with flags and everything draped over them. We are going to persuade all you folks to volunteer and get in the Army.

"Now any of you hard-boiled fellows, though, who do not want to fight, do not have to; you need not come in. We will take these brave, heroic, willing fellows who love the country; we will put them in the front lines; they will be shot first; but as to the rest of you boys, we serve notice on you now that if you go to the brush you can stay there until all these other fellows are killed off, and then we may come and root you out."

If there is any military obligation on anybody, it is on everybody.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I now return to the question which I have posed as representing the crux of this controversy. It does not have anything to do with girls dressed up in bunting. It deals solely with a terrific challenge to the fundamental philosophy of American life.

This, I repeat, is the question: Has the volunteer system under adequate trial demonstrated that it cannot be trusted to produce the recruits required by the Army and the Navy as swiftly as may be needed, fully to match and man our new facilities for the defense of America and her essential ideals? I answer "No," and I now propose to examine my proofs.

The first important fact to note is that the Army and the Navy have filled every volunteer quota they have sought this year. That major fact stands out beyond controversy. Certainly it is a key fact. The Army and the Navy have filled every volunteer quota they have sought this year, It is no answer to say that the quotas have not been sufficiently large to satisfy the Army's growing appetite. That begs the question. Until larger quotas have been tried and have failed, the clear and highly creditable presumption must persist that the Army and the Navy can get what they want by the traditional, peacetime volunteer system.

Army enlistments totaled 23,442 in June, and 31,958 in July—"a peacetime record," commented the Washington Star last Saturday night. With no more stimulus than a sporadic newspaper discussion of prospective enlistment needs the July enlistments jumped nearly 50 percent over June. In both instances the Army got everything it asked from the volunteer spirit of American youth. It could have gotten much more, as I shall presently show, but, in any event, it got everything it sought.

The Navy has always gotten everything it has sought. Yet we are told that the volunteer system has "broken down." We are told that it is no longer reliable. We are told that it is a poor, decrepit thing. We are told that it must be abandoned as a peacetime recourse. We are told the record makes these things plain.

Mr. President, I must confess that the record does not make them plain to me. It seems to me that the only logic in the situation leads to an exactly contrary and completely convincing conclusion.

The Army and the Navy have filled every volunteer quota they have sought in spite of the fact that the volunteer system has not had adequate trial. There has been no remote effort to emphasize the need or the desire for recruits. Has the President issued a ringing call for volunteers? He has not. Has there been a persuasive fireside chat upon the subject? [Laughter in the galleries.] There has not. Has there been a vigorous campaign to instruct young America in its country's need for volunteers? There has not. Have volunteer enlistments on a 1-year instead of a 3-year basis been permitted? They have not. Has the Army base pay of $21 a month been raised to equal the $30 average quickly attained by naval enlistees, thus equalizing a gross and retarding discrimination? It has not.

Have the desired quotas been stepped up to the tempo required by contemplated needs? They have not.

Yet the volunteer system is now condemned as a prospective failure, although it has not failed a single contemporary demand, and we are told it must give way to the wartime draft in time of peace.

I confess that that is wholly mystifying to me. I can understand why the defense need took on new color of urgency—particularly in the minds of those who fearfully believe that our involvement in the European war sooner or later is inevitable, and who favor a foreign policy which might, however unwittingly take us nearer to this hazard.

I can understand why the defense need took on new color of urgency after the battle of Flanders in early June; I can understand how trepidation would increase, in the mind of any prudent person, after the French surrender later in June, but I cannot understand why these factors should not have immediately recommended a swift step-up in efforts to invite larger recruitment by the volunteer method, which up to that moment, and even up to now, has not failed a single contribution asked of it.

I cannot understand why the situation suddenly called for an abandonment of the volunteer process; suddenly called for a sinister compulsion which never heretofore has been embraced until we have been well into war itself; suddenly called for general conscription, which, in my humble judgment, will not stop with the mere regimentation of men when once we launch this new peacetime element of duress into our national life; suddenly called for a national system which will set up a new bureaucracy in every county in the land, with broad powers to control the life and destiny of every young American; suddenly called for an army not only of young conscripts, but also for another army of draft-board overlords—there were more than 200,000 of them in the World War draft—and the tremendous added burden of expense involved therein. I can understand how American public opinion itself, harassed and perplexed by constant rumors of war and by our deeply sympathetic reactions to the plight of the victims of black conquest elsewhere, should swing restlessly—even impatiently—toward greater and ever greater national defense, groping, as it were, for safety. Certainly that was the subconscious process of my own mind. I think it explains the trend of the so-called Gallup poll from 61 percent against conscription last October to 66 percent in favor of it today. It explains the trend, but it does not vindicate the result, because the specific question asked by Dr. Gallup did not pose the true question at issue in this controversy.

Please understand, this is no complaint against Dr. Gallup's motive. It is merely the result of the inevitable prejudice inherent in his mechanism. Was anybody asked whether he would prefer peacetime conscription even though we could still obtain in the traditional American voluntary way all the men the Army and the Navy need? Oh, no! Was there a single word in either of the Gallup questions to remind the voters of the voluntary, as opposed to the compulsory, principle? Oh, no! True, one of his questions explored the theme of universal military training, and attempted to argue that the result automatically swept voluntary service into the discard; but, in my view, universal military training as an abstract thesis is wholly different from the present specific issue, which potentially is a war-service issue, involving implications all its own at this particular moment in our national life.

The Gallup question bearing upon the real problem of today was:

> Do you favor increasing the size of our Army and Navy by drafting men between the ages of 18 and 32 to serve in the armed forces for 1 year?

I, myself, would answer that question "Yes," under certain circumstances. I, myself, could not answer that question "No" and truthfully reflect my whole view. My answer would be "Yes," if the volunteer system showed any signs of failing. My answer would be "No" only if the volunteer system continued to operate successfully, as it has been operating, and is operating today in respect to every quota sought by the Army and Navy.

How many voters in the Gallup poll faced this same confusion? How many voted "Yes" because under the prejudicial circumstances involved, it was their only chance of supporting the general project of a bigger Army and Navy personnel? Would not the result have been even more affirmative if the question had been, "Do you favor the peacetime volunteer system of enlistments so long as the Army and Navy can fill their quotas?"

What would have happened if this had been the question, "If the volunteer system of enlistment fails, would you then favor a draft law?" I think about 95 percent would have approved.

So I come back again to my own text. In my view, the volunteer system is not receiving a fair test, either in practice or in public opinion; yet in practice it is not failing to meet a single test. No wonder Hon. Harry H. Woodring, who has just retired after 7 distinguished years as Secretary of War, in which position he certainly had more than casual opportunities to assess this problem, and in which he was intimately in touch with the inside opinions of our Army experts, bravely says:

> How any fair-minded Member of Congress could say that we have given the voluntary system of enlistment for the United States Army service a fair trial and that it has broken down, and therefore we need the compulsory service, is beyond my understanding.

That is the statement of the man who has had longer association with Army responsibility and defense responsibility under this administration during the past 8 years than has any other man except the President himself.

Let us scan a few revealing exhibits over the country. Let us look around and see how the volunteer system is breaking down.

Here is a news dispatch from my own State of Michigan:

> More than 900 Detroit and Michigan youths joined the United States armed forces in July, establishing a new peace-time recruiting record. Every branch reached or exceeded its quota, as 937 men were selected from more than 2,000 applicants.

A new peacetime recruiting period; every branch exceeding its requirements; yet, we are told that the system is breaking down. In Detroit the Marine Corps had so many applicants that a number equal to 50 percent of the July quota is waiting for August enlistments. The services could not even take care of those who wanted to volunteer; yet the volunteer system is indicted for failing to produce the men the Nation needs.

From the same State of Michigan, at Saginaw:

> At the present time 25 men are on—

What do you suppose?

> the waiting list, and will be assigned to various departments of the Army—

When?

> as soon as vacancies occur.

Down in the Carolinas, from the Charlotte Observer:

> Army enlistments for the Charlotte district broke all previous records last week when 504 men were recruited in the Carolinas.

"Broke all records." We find the same story from every corner and quarter of this land. Yet it is said that the volunteer system has broken down. It has not broken down. There must be another reason for suddenly and precipitately asking America to submit to peacetime compulsory militarism for the first time in 150 years.

Out in California—I am "sampling the Nation," as Dr. Gallup would say—the Los Angeles Evening Herald for July 31 says:

> Recruiting at the United States Army station in Los Angeles so far this month has broken all peacetime records.

Mr. President, wherever we explore the situation we seem to find the phrase, "broken all peacetime records," yet we are told that the volunteer system has broken down.

I continue:

> Navy and Marine Corps recruiting offices are crowded with applicants, and the aviation branches of all services are overenlisted and have waiting lists.

Yet we are told that the men needed cannot be obtained by relying upon the traditional volunteer system.

In Illinois, a citizen's letter in a Chicago newspaper says:

> I suggested to a young man out of a job that he join the Army. I phoned the United States Army recruiting officer for information and was told there were no vacancies. I nearly fell over in a faint. The quota full, and yet all this hullabaloo about the draft! On repeating the story to a friend I found that 27 young men in the little town of Ashley had been told there were no vacancies.

From the same State of Illinois, a letter to me dated August 7 says:

> On Tuesday, August 6, at United States Courthouse, Chicago, 23 voluntary Army recruits were turned down. Reason: Quota filled, no housing, no equipment.

Back to North Carolina. This is from the Greensboro Record:

> More rigid rules are being set for applicants. They will not be applied to applicants now on the waiting list.

My God, they cannot even take in those who are trying to get in, and yet they say the system has broken down and that it is not producing the youth power which the Nation needs.

Back to Michigan and my home city of Grand Rapids. The board of education has been trying for 3 years to obtain four additional junior units of the R. O. T. C.; but as late as last June 14 The Adjutant General of the War Department advised that there would be no extension of the R. O. T. C. for some time. Thirty such applications in the Sixth Corps Area are in a pigeonhole, where the whole volunteer system seems destined needlessly to go.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The same situation exists in Montana. Many young men have wanted to go into the R. O. T. C. They have appealed to the Army people in Washington and have been unable to obtain any allotment or anything else.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the testimony is so universal that it could be duplicated in every quarter of every State in the Union. There is no break-down in the volunteer system, but there is a break-down in the willingness to acknowledge its success.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BURKE. In spite of all that the Senator has quoted from different sections of the country, the records seem to indicate that for the first five and a half months of this year, until the 15th of June, the total increase in the enlisted force of the United States Army was a little less than 15,000 men, notwithstanding the fact that a very active drive was put on. Then June came, and the selective-service bill was introduced. There has been much discussion of it, conditions have become much more serious abroad, and the enlistments have very greatly increased. However, there is still a total lack of evidence that we can safely rely on the volunteer system.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I suppose the most authentic publication in service circles is the Army and Navy Journal. The Army and Navy Journal for last August 3 boasts in its leading front-page article of "the great and successful drive to rapidly increase the enlisted strength of the Army under a volunteer recruiting system."

How about the thousands of patriotic colored citizens of the United States who cannot get into volunteer service at all because so relatively few units are provided for them? Under date of August 5 the Secretary of War writes me regarding this question, as follows:

> A large portion of the colored men who enlist in the Army make the service a life-time career. For this reason there is a comparatively low turn-over in colored organizations and, consequently, comparatively a small number of openings for original enlistments at any one time. * * * The question of the formation of additional colored units is under study in the War Department.

Here is a great sector of our people which can scarcely chisel its volunteer way into a service which, when it has had the chance it has always sustained with great devotion. We are advised that there is a small number of openings for original enlistment and that the opening up of these volunteer opportunities is now under study. Yet we are told the volunteer system has broken down. No, Mr. President, it has not broken down, and there are no signs that it will break down. The Burke-Wadsworth bill simply proposes to abandon it arbitrarily and without justification.

It seems to me that this volunteer record ought to be a source of deep American gratification and pride; that we ought to cheer it as a spontaneous demonstration of voluntary fidelity to the American system and as a source of immeasurable national strength, rather than falsely to brand it as an outmoded, impotent reliance upon volunteer devotions which no longer exist.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Is the Senator aware of the fact that at the end of the 5 months referred to by the Senator from Nebraska, on June 1, the total authorized strength of the Army was only 228,000, and that quota had been filled by enlistment on the 1st of June. So the Senator's statement that the system met the demands upon it is just as true of the first 5 months of the year as it is of the months since that time?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his testimony. It is unquestionably true, as asserted by him, and as I have repeatedly stated, that no Army quota has failed this year.

Mr. President, if one of our purposes is to impress alien conquerors with the inadvisability of trifling with Uncle Sam, I submit that the lesson would be doubly significant, its impact would be far more conclusive if the telltale message went across the seas that without conscription, without regimentation, without even the threat of a forced draft, young America has fully and adequately volunteered to sustain the institutions of democracy in the Western World.

Mr. President, I wish to say again that if the choice we must make between volunteer enlistment and the forced draft was a choice between two implements equally consistent with our free institutions, the matter would be of less importance and certainly of less concern to me. But such is not the case. Peacetime military compulsion, I care not what its form or what its sugar-coating may be, is alien to American ideal; it is deeply repugnant to the consciences of millions of our people who are just as devoted to adequate national defense as is the Chief of Staff himself. If they are in the minority, which I doubt, still they number millions; indeed, I have presented one such petition bearing 1,000,000 signatures. Peacetime military compulsion has never been a part of the Army pattern. It has been reserved for hard-pressed monarchs or for imperial marshals on the march.

Peacetime military compulsion cannotes many another form of peacetime compulsion. Say what you please, something precious goes out of the American way of life and something potentially sinister enters. Look out for the next step. Our choice is not a choice between implements equally consistent with our free institutions.

Therefore, in my view, compulsion should be embraced only when the volunteer system shows at least some sign of failing to supply our needs. It has shown no such sign as yet, even though it has not had the benefit of a real drive and a fair chance. Give it the benefit and stimulus of a Presidential call; give it the opportunity for 1 year enlistments instead of 3; justly reorganize the pay scale; expand the quotas; make a real business of seeing that it works; and then, if it fails, so far as I am concerned, the test can be completed in the next hundred days; Congress will be here in session; we can pass a draft law in short order, and we will not have to follow the theory and philosophy of my distinguished friend the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] that it is imperative to legislate now in anticipation of a default which is not likely to occur.

Oh, but it is said 400,000 men are wanted by October 1. Why? In terms of emergency, why? We have just voted the Commander in Chief 252,000 National Guard men and some 160,000 other component reserves. Yet we are told that only 50,000 will really be called for some time to come. The remainder will simply be "on order," like most of our equipment. Why the October quest for 400,000 conscripts when 200,000 National Guard men and 160,000 other component reserves will still be available and uncalled? Why this positively frenzied speed to upset the volunteer system? What is in the wind? The Regular Army, the National Guard, and the component reserves will shortly number a total of 750,000. Chief William S. Knudsen, of the National Defense Council, told us last Friday that equipment for a fully balanced combat army of even 750,000 men will not be available until 1942. Why 400,000 additional conscripts over and above 750,000 men by next October 1?

There is no pretense that Navy volunteers are not coming just as fast as they can possibly be assimilated. There is no pretense that the air force is not getting everything it can handle; and, so far as the defense emergency is concerned, Secretary of War Stimson spent most of his time last Friday before the Senate Finance Committee proving that the air force is the key to the whole situation and that armies are a secondary consideration. Why this sudden, precipitate Army need for men, which is the only reason given us for this equally sudden and precipitate demand for immediate conscription? It is sudden and precipitate. The best proof is that neither the Republican convention in Philadelphia last June 24 nor the Democratic convention in Chicago last July 15 even knew anything about this need, and a draft resolution in either convention would have been howled out of the forum. They would not have dared write it in their party's platform. After all, we are not at war, although—now listen—as reproduced in the New York Herald Tribune of July 26, the "selective-service questionnaire for all American men 18 to 64 under the pending bill"—I quote the headline verbatim—contained this sentence in the instructions:

> The Nation is at war, and every registrant is thus put on notice to know his position and duty.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield in a moment. Undoubtedly by now that telltale line has been deleted, but it cannot be deleted from most of our understandings as to what drafts are for and as to why conscription laws heretofore have been written into the laws of the United States.

I trust there was no such a prophecy in that omnious line; or was there? I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, as a member of the resolutions committee of the Democratic convention at Chicago, let me say that while conscription was never mentioned a plank was offered which would tend to indicate that the person who offered it favored conscription. That plank was voted down almost unanimously by the committee. Let me say further that if it had been attempted in that committee to endorse the Burke-Wadsworth bill it would have been practically unanimously voted down, and likewise I am sure it would have been voted down by the convention itself.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator asserts his history correctly.

I repeat we are not at war. Most of us, despite our deep-seated resentment against the new technique of European and Asiatic conquest, say we do not intend to go to war except as war comes to us.

Our aid to Britain is always presumed, according to the current phrase, to stop short of war. If we think things through, and avoid impulsive errors which would do more credit to our hearts than to our heads, I believe we can honorably and safely avoid war, particularly if we perfect an adequate defense—and I mean defense. Yet no one knows what lies ahead. We have renewed a tremendous obligation under the Monroe Doctrine, although I sincerely hope it is not construed to mean that our Armies shall garrison every foot of territory in the Western World. Our policies in the Far East, so far as any of us up here on Capitol Hill can understand them, could lure us into trouble in Asia even easier than in Europe. I am frank to say that I think we sometimes are entirely too prone to ask for trouble. But, anyway, there is no denial of the need for supreme vigilance and the swiftest practical mobilization of a balanced national defense. If this were not so, we should not have almost unanimously authorized present and prospective defense appropriations already crowding $15,000,000,000.

I accept this thesis. Furthermore, I do not propose to ask the country to risk any error of judgment of mine as to what lies ahead, because I frankly understand that what lies ahead depends in considerable measure upon decisions almost exclusively in the hands of the President, and I have no means of knowing what he contemplates. It depends, too, upon foreign factors entirely beyond the control of any of us. I do not propose to pose as a military strategist, which I am not. So, even though I am completely mystified as to why we need an additional 400,000 men in the Army this fall, unless we are planning to go to war, I will, to be on the safe side, accept even that measure of our need, although the arbitrary date of October 1 is obviously a fiction, because it would have to be extended even under the workings of the pending bill. I will even accept the figure in spite of the fact that I cannot understand it. I quarrel simply with the method sought to be pursued, and the implications it invites.

I dismiss all collateral controversy, and I come back to the one and single proposition upon which I stand: This democracy cannot afford, for the sake of the spirit of its institutions, to embrace peacetime military compulsion unless and until its legitimate and essential national defense cannot otherwise be served.

Neighboring Canada did not do so until she had been all the way into this war for more than a year, and even then there will be no such action as we are asked to take. Indeed, the Canadian parallel is not without its illuminating significance. Canada's conscription date is October 1. So, too, will ours be October 1 under the pending bill. But there the similarity abruptly ends.

Canada takes the step after 12 months as an active belligerent. We take it before we go to war, before we are threatened with war, and while we are constantly asserting that we shall keep out of war.

Canada, at war, conscripts for 30 days' active, continuous training, and then sends her sons back to their home areas for part-time supplemental instruction, so that their economic life shall not be wholly and needlessly disrupted. Canada, at war, conscripts for 30 continuous days. The United States, not at war, conscripts for 1 full year, and thus completely dislocates the economic life of those upon whom it lays its compulsory hands.

Canada, at war, confines the service of its conscripts to the home area. The United States, not at war, conscripts them for any spot or place on earth.

Evidently, some of our short-of-war ideas rival war itself; and, evidently, some of our new democracy is less democratic than that of a dominion acknowledging a king.

Perhaps Canada agrees more sympathetically than we do with the considered opinions of Hanson W. Baldwin, highly respected military expert of the New York Times, regarding the nature of our hazard. Mr. Baldwin dismisses the idea that even the powerful German war machine, if foolish enough to bring its war to this side of the ocean, could successfully prosecute it. He points out that it would take seven and a half tons of shipping per man to bring an army here, and 13 tons or more of shipping per month per man to sustain it. He suggests that these figures multiplied by fifty or one hundred thousand illustrate the vastness and the improbabilities of the problem. He says that the difficulty would be nearly as great for this potential foe even if the United States should lose control of the sea. So he concludes—and he is one of the acknowledged experts of the land—that our predominant defense need is on the sea and in the air, and he asserts that a highly skilled and integrated army of 400,000 men is our maximum land requirement, and he insists that it should be built from voluntary enlistment.

It is interesting to note, in passing, that this rather agrees with the testimony given in pre-conscription days by a high ranking officer of our own General Staff before the House Military Affairs Committee last January, when he said that if we had 480,000 properly equipped men, plus the National Guard, all the nations of Europe combined, with full control of the high seas, could not land one corps of troops on American shores. That, of course, would not take account of our broader responsibilities under the Monroe Doctrine; yet President Roosevelt himself said, as recently as last week, that it is his opinion that "the chances are 100 to 1 against American Regular troops or National Guard men ever being assigned to active service outside of the continental United States or its possessions." If his speculative figures are of any reliance whatever, then the chances of any remote need for the legislation now upon the bar of the Senate are 100 to 1.

But perhaps Mr. Baldwin, in the observations I have quoted from him, is wrong, and we must take no chances. I agree that we must take no chances. We must give ourselves the benefit of every doubt by way of vigilance. Mr. Baldwin is not wrong, however, when he warns that our conscription decision must not be lightly taken. He is not wrong when he says:

> Invocation of a compulsory service act has many arguments in its favor, but it should be clearly understood that its adoption would create a profound, lasting, and inescapable change in the economic, social, and political life of our country and might well retard the growth of our civilization. A measure of such consequence, if enacted in time of peace, may become a permanent part of our institutions; it should not, therefore, be considered by Congress in this era of hysteria, but, if intended as a permanent measure, only in a time of calm calculation. On the other hand, if conscription is needed merely as a temporary emergency measure to last for the duration of the emergency, then the emergency ought to be defined. If the international picture is black enough to warrant conscription, then the President should declare a state of national emergency or Congress should declare a state of war.

Mr. President, I think this concludes the statement of my position. I sum it up as follows:

I am opposed to American entry into war unless war comes to us or to our outposts.

I am opposed to any foreign policies which would hasten this calamity by one needless single hour.

I favor and I support the maximum military, naval, and air facilities required for the fully adequate defense of the United States and our essential outposts.

I accept my share of our full and complete responsibility for enforcing the Monroe Doctrine in territory contiguous to us or directly related to our safety, and I accept a reciprocal partnership share in defense of the Monroe Doctrine elsewhere in the Western Hemisphere as recently sketched at the Habana Conference.

I want our appropriate defense equipment and personnel developed as swiftly as they can be, but in this process I want to save as much of precious democracy as is still possible in this still free America.

I am opposed to peacetime military compulsions because I think they tear at the vitals of the American ideal and the American way of life. I think they connote sweeping implications of menace far beyond the immediate thing itself. Therefore I believe they should neither be embraced nor approached except in the presence of clear proof that there is no other way to save ourselves. I believe that the traditional peacetime method of voluntary military service has not failed or promised to fail. I believe that it can be made to serve our every realistic peacetime need, as it has done up to this good hour.

I fully recognize the menace that roams the Old World. I hate every phase of its conquest. I want a powerful America to be able to keep this menace from the Western Hemisphere; yes, and to be able to lift a powerful voice of counsel in behalf of restored autonomies for submerged peoples when the final post-war readjustment comes.

I will not for an instant stand in the way of adequate preparedness. But, on the face of the record and on the face of peacetime experience, the voluntary military system can and does and will continue to produce adequate preparedness; it can and does and will continue fully to keep pace with our expanding equipment and material. If and when it fails—and when it even shows that it has started to commence to fail—I will promptly take the other course. Until then I shall continue to oppose compulsory peacetime military service—first because it is presently unnecessary in behalf of full defense; second, because it is a wrenching departure from the traditional American ideal of liberty for a century and a half; third, because it injects into our economy a philosophy of forced controls which should be resisted because of their direction and their further implications, as well as their immediate length; fourth, because Congress is here and can promptly supply any correction if it be required by unfolding destiny.

With reluctance I disagree in this matter with some of my cherished friends, whose opinions I deeply respect, but with profound conviction I assert my faith and take my stand.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have not concluded, but I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did the Senator from Michigan vote for the peacetime compulsory draft of the National Guard last week?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I did.

Mr. BURKE obtained the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, the selective training and service bill, now under consideration, is the result of the hard work and, I may say, the intelligent and clear-headed effort of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. To all the members of that committee, and in particular to its able and farsighted chairman, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], Congress and the country owe a debt of gratitude that will be more fully appreciated with every day that passes.

It was my privilege and honor to present the bill which formed the basis of discussion in that committee. A large number of able witnesses appeared and offered their views, both pro and con, concerning every phase of the matter. From the start it was apparent that the overwhelming majority of the members of the committee saw clearly that to safeguard the security of the United States requires the prompt enactment of a well-considered selective compulsory military training and service act. I have no doubt that the committee sentiment fairly represents that of the great majority of this body and of the entire country.

There has been reference during the day by several different speakers to the Gallup poll, which was reported yesterday in the Washington Post, among other newspapers. I am not one of those who consider the Gallup poll as the Bible and that its conclusions can be relied upon without question. I think the evidence indicates that it has heretofore been able to assay the sentiment of the country with a very considerable degree of accuracy. I have no doubt that the time will come when it will make a mistake, if it has not already done so, as all those who attempt to judge sentiment certainly do at one time or another. But up to this time it would be rather a foolish position for anyone to take that no credence at all should be placed in the Gallup poll. In fact, I think its conclusions are worthy of serious consideration. I would not have referred to this matter except that, as I have said, it has been mentioned on the floor by a number of speakers today; and since that has been done, I shall in a moment offer the last poll for insertion in the RECORD. Before doing so let me read the first paragraph. The heading is "Voters in all States favor conscription by 2 to 1, poll shows."

And then beginning the discussion by Dr. George Gallup:

If the voters of the 48 States went to the polls tomorrow to settle the question of compulsory military training in a Nationwide refendum—

Which some now advocate—

the military-training principle would sweep to victory in every State in the Union.

That fact is revealed today in a State-by-State survey of the American Institute of Public Opinion, as Congress debates the pros and cons of the issue in Washington.

Despite America's long tradition of "no conscription in peacetime," the events of recent months have so altered United States opinion that compulsory military training would carry the country by a 2-to-1 vote.

In a country with upward of 60,000,000 eligible voters, the survey indicates approximately 40,000,000 in favor of conscription, 20,000,000 opposed.

Mr. President, at this point I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted as part of my remarks what is called the Gallup poll survey appearing in the Washington Post of Sunday, August 11, 1940.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of August 11, 1940]

THE GALLUP POLL—VOTERS IN ALL STATES FAVOR CONSCRIPTION BY 2 TO 1, POLL SHOWS

(By Dr. George Gallup, Director, American Institute of Public Opinion)

PRINCETON, N. J., August 11.—If the voters of the 48 States went to the polls tomorrow to settle the question of compulsory military training in a Nation-wide referendum, the military-training principle would sweep to victory in every State in the Union.

That fact is revealed today in a State-by-State survey of the American Institute of Public Opinion, as Congress debates the pros and cons of the issue in Washington.

Despite America's long tradition of no conscription in peacetime, the events of recent months have so altered United States opinion that compulsory military training would carry the country by a 2-to-1 vote.

In a country with upwards of 60,000,000 eligible voters, the survey indicates approximately 40,000,000 in favor of conscription, 20,000,000 opposed.

States where conscription sentiment has reached the greatest peaks are Mississippi, 87 percent; Texas, 80 percent; Georgia, 79 percent; Maine, 77 percent; and Florida, 75 percent. But even in such traditionally isolationist States as Kansas, Minnesota, and Iowa, the vote favoring conscription averages well over 50 percent. The closest division of opinion is in Indiana, where 55 percent say they favor peacetime conscription.

Just what plan for compulsory military training will finally emerge from congressional conference rooms, no one can yet say. Anticipating that the question of peacetime conscription might come before the United States, the American Institute of Public Opinion began more than 20 months ago to measure public sentiment on the issue.

Voters in every State in the Union have been asked:

"Do you think every able-bodied young man, 20 years old, should be made to serve in the Army, Navy, or air forces for 1 year?"

This is the principle of conscription most familiar in European nations. It is important to note that this proposal involves the conscription of all able-bodied youths reaching the age of 20, without exception.

In the survey just completed the national vote is:

	Percent
Favor conscription	66
Oppose conscription	34

One voter in 12 (8 percent) said he was undecided or without an opinion on the question.

ALSO FAVOR DRAFT FOR MEN 18–32

In a supplementary question, the Institute measured sentiment on one of the many proposals for selective-service training of men between the ages of 18 and 32. Voters were asked:

"Do you favor increasing the size of our Army and Navy by drafting men between the ages of 18 and 32 to serve in the armed forces for 1 year?"

The replies to this specific proposal show an even greater majority favoring conscription:

	Percent
Favor draft for 18–32 group	71
Oppose draft	29

Only 1 voter in 20 (5 percent) said he was undecided or without an opinion.

SUPPORT FROM LABOR, YOUNG PEOPLE

Not only would the conscription principle carry every 1 of the 48 States at the present time, but it would win majorities with virtually all the important political and social groups which together make up the American people, the survey shows.

Labor-union members, interviewed in the course of the Institute survey, averaged 71 percent in favor of such a policy, despite the fact that labor leaders like John L. Lewis and William Green have spoken in opposition.

Young people between the ages of 21 and 30—the age group most likely to be directly affected by conscription—averaged 62 percent in favor of it.

As analyzed separately, the vote of Republicans and Democrats, and men and women, are as follows:

	Favoring conscription	Opposing conscription
	Percent	Percent
Democrats	73	27
Republicans	60	40
Men voters	68	32
Women voters	63	37

EVENTS SINCE SPRING CHANGED OPINION

It was not until the German "blitzkrieg" against Holland and Belgium last May that a majority of American voters came to approve a policy of peacetime conscription for the United States, institute surveys reveal.

Over the past 20 months the trend of opinion has been as follows:

In the last fortnight, the survey shows, opinion has leveled off somewhat, possibly as the result of criticism of compulsory military training by some Members of Congress. Nevertheless, American opinion is still approximately 2 to 1 in favor.

Even in North Dakota, home State of the isolationist, Senator GERALD P. NYE, the vote favoring conscription reaches 71 percent, and in Montana, home of Senator WHEELER, the vote averages 64 percent in favor.

SHARP CONTRAST WITH CONGRESSIONAL MAIL

The results of the institute's survey are in sharp contrast with much of the congressional mail received in the last few weeks. Reports from Washington indicate that a majority of the letter writers thus far have been against military training, and some Congressman have given great weight to such indications of sentiment. It is interesting to note, however, that the institute's surveys at the time of the lifting of the arms embargo were also in sharp contradiction to the congressional mail at that time, some of the mail running as high as 9 to 1 against selling arms to the Allies, while the polls consistently showed a majority in favor of sending arms.

Mr. BURKE. I have said, Mr. President, that I have no doubt the committee sentiment—and I am referring to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, which, as I understand, voted this bill out 13 to 3—fairly represents that of the great majority of this body and of the entire country.

There was no partisanship in the presentation of views on the part of the witnesses who appeared, whether they were on one side or the other, nor in the action of the committee. All conducted themselves as men do when they are engaged in the performance of a patriotic duty.

I recall only one discordant note in the committee. The committee recognized it as such and paid no attention to it. Possibly I should not refer to it here, but I mention it now merely because it is a matter of record appearing in the printed report of the hearings, and perhaps should not be ignored, petty though it was and a silly performance on the part of a witness who was supposed to have some sense.

Norman Thomas opened his testimony in opposition to the bill by charging that the humble sponsor of the measure, the junior Senator from Nebraska, is pro-Hitler and that there was some deep significance in the fact that I should be the one to introduce a bill which, according to this leader of the Socialist Party grossly violates—and I quote his language—

American tradition and the American way of life.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Am I to understand the junior Senator from Nebraska to state that he was accused by the witness of being pro-Hitler?

Mr. BURKE. I will read the exact language of the witness.

Mr. HATCH. I was wondering if that witness had read the remarks made by the junior Senator from Nebraska at the time we were considering the repeal of the arms embargo?

Mr. BURKE. I am very sure that the witness could not have read them, or have known anything about my attitude in the matter, other than that he had at some time seen headlines in a certain newspaper and accepted them as a full measure of my position.

Mr. HATCH. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, but in justice to him I should like to say that I was present in the Senate the day the Senator made his statement as to his position on the repeal of the arms embargo. There was no more vigorous and forceful statement made in favor of the Allies and against the government represented by Mr. Hitler, than was made by the junior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BURKE. I thank the Senator from New Mexico. The testimony of the witness, to which I have referred, appears on page 255 of the printed record of the hearings, and after referring to a headline which had appeared in a New York newspaper at one time, Mr. Thomas went on to say:

It is symbolically appropriate and significant that it is a Senator holding these sentiments who is author and sponsor of the proposal for peacetime military conscription which your committee is now considering—

And so forth.

I am referring now to the statement of the witness that the sponsor of this legislation has sympathy with the Hitler regime, and to his further statement that the proposal is a violation of American traditions and the American way of life.

In both respects the distinguished Socialist leader apparently reached his conclusions after the most superficial study—in the one case, a newspaper headline, in the other, probably no more than a casual reading of the bill.

I do not need to read the next sentence I have in my remarks, because of the very helpful interruption of the Senator from New Mexico, but I will read it, anyway.

Even a cursory study of the record—not that it is a matter of any importance—would have made it clear to Mr. Thomas that I have been outspoken in condemnation of the suppression of liberty by Hitler; that I have denounced on the public platform in many sections of the country the racial and religious persecution which will make that name infamous for all time to come, and that I have supported every measure short of war by which this country could aid his intended victims.

Mr. Thomas is equally in error, Mr. President, in believing or stating that there is anything in the selective training and service bill that is un-American or in any particular violates the finest American traditions. It is that phase of the matter which I propose to discuss; but before doing so, I wish briefly to present the facts concerning the drafting of the original bill. It is a subject which has been much discussed, and I fear greatly misrepresented. I am now quoting from official records.

Acting under the authority of the National Defense Act of June 4, 1920, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy created a committee consisting of Army and Navy officers to study the question of manpower for our armed forces. In 1926 this committee was organized into the Joint Army and Navy Selective Service Committee, and additional personnel was added, including officer personnel from the Regular Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps.

Let me observe at this point that there are some who seem to think it is a matter of discredit that the Chief of Staff and the highest commanding officers of the Army, as well as those who hold like positions in the Navy, should have anything to do with drafting a measure relating to military policy. It seems to me that second thought would convince even a schoolboy that in dealing with matters of national policy and in working out a peace program we naturally turn to those men for their opinions, not necessarily because the elected representatives of the people must follow them, but because they are entitled to great weight.

So I say that in 1926 the committee was enlarged. Specialist Reserve officers of the Army were called in who had played a prominent part in the administration of selective service during the World War, together with legal officers from the Judge Advocate General's department of the Army and the Judge Advocate General's office of the Navy.

The committee immediately set about to study the manpower draft systems employed in the North and in the South during the War between the States, our selective-service system, and the systems for securing manpower in Great Britain, France, and Germany during the World War, together with the applicable constitutional and statutory provisions. Out of this study the joint committee developed a selective-service bill.

At the same time there was at work a civilian committee representing the Military Training Camps Association. From the record I give the facts concerning that association.

The association was created in 1915 as a part of the Plattsburg training-camp movement. It became a national group, with representatives in every State in the Union. It had much to do with the functioning of the officers' training camps in 1917. After the war the Military Training Camps Association was active in support of the National Defense Act of 1920. Each year it has aided materially in recruiting young men for the Citizens' Military Training Camps. The president of the association serves automatically as the chief civilian aide to the Secretary of War.

The governing body of the association is composed of the nine corps area civilian aides to the Secretary of War. There are also State aides in every State, and county chairmen in most counties.

Mr. President, it must be clear, to every reasonable mind that this voluntary association of patriotic and able men has been rendering to the cause of national defense a service which is of inestimable value. A few months ago, when conditions in Europe began to assume their present alarming aspect, these men, who for years have been giving much thought and effort to the question of military training of the citizen, realized that the time had come when their work must be greatly expanded. They saw that the country confronted a crisis which placed upon every citizen an obligation to prepare himself to render the fullest measure of service of which he could be made capable. So the Military Training Camps Association selected a special emergency committee. Mr. Grenville Clark, able lawyer and lifelong student of the problem of citizen training, was named as chairman. From the very beginning of this movement, 25 years ago, Mr. Clark has given unstintedly of his time and superior talents to the cause of preparedness of the manpower of this Nation.

Serving on the committee with Mr. CLARK, among others, was Gen. John McAuley Palmer, probably the most distinguished authority in the country on military policy. He was chief of operations for General Pershing in France during the World War. He was one of the able draftsmen of the National Defense Act of 1920, and served at that time as adviser to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, of which Senator Wadsworth was then chairman.

Another member of the emergency committee was Col. William J. Donovan, who is well known to practically every Member of this body. Without doubt, Colonel Donovan has had a wider military experience than has any other civilian soldier in the United States. Only a few days ago the press reported his return from a confidential mission across the water as a representative of the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy.

I shall not take the time to give the names of the other distinguished gentlemen who served on the committee of the Military Training Camps Association to assist in drafting a selective training and service bill.

While the bill was being drafted the program was discussed by the committee with our leading military authorities, including General Pershing; General Bullard; General Harbord; General Marshall, Chief of Staff; General Drum; General Miles; General O'Ryan; General Haskell, head of the New York National Guard; General Reckord, head of the Maryland National Guard; Col. Frederick Palmer, veteran war correspondent; and innumerable others who have ideas based upon experience and observation which the committee thought would be worth while considering in the drafting of this legislation.

The men whose names I have mentioned, the members of the committee, and the others who were consulted, are one in their firm conviction that the safety and welfare of the United States require the prompt passage of a compulsory training and service act. In the face of such unanimity on the part of those who are best advised on the subject of the requirements of our national defense, it seems to me that the average citizen, in or out of the Senate, would of necessity proceed with caution and care before opposing the principle embodied in the measure.

In matters of detail there are, of course, many conflicting views. The committee which has reported the bill under the able guidance of the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] urges its passage. The committee studied the proposal which I submitted on behalf of the Military Training Camps Association, the divergent views in many details of the report of the joint Army and Navy committee, and the testimony of a great many witnesses. They have brought forth a finished product, sound in principle, carefully studied in every provision, and deserving of most serious consideration.

Mr. President, at this time I do not care to enter into any particular discussion of details. Some have already been discussed, and others will follow as the debate proceeds. I shall be present and hope to take part in the discussion. Today it is the broad underlying principle which holds my attention. That principle is attacked in a number of ways. First, the question is asked, Is a system of compulsory selective military training and service undemocratic and un-American? I have already read what Norman Thomas had to say as a witness before the committee when he answered the question in the affirmative.

Those words come readily to the lips of those who for any reason do not want the legislation enacted. They are used by many whose devotion to democracy and the American way of life is beyond all question. They are also spoken by others whose Americanism might be subject to serious doubt.

I have in my folder a placard which I am told is being distributed from house to house throughout southern California. It is headed in big black lines, "Stop conscription! Peacetime conscription is contrary to every principle of our American form of Government."

By whom, it may be asked, is this campaign being carried on? The placard recites at the bottom of the first page that it is issued by "Los Angeles County Communist Party, Los Angeles County Young Communist League."

On the reverse side of the placard is a political advertisement headed, "We, the Communist candidates, take our stand."

The placard concludes with the admonition to hear Earl Browder, Communist candidate for President, on September 8.

Mr. President, I do not cite this in criticism of the Communist Party or the Communist candidate. Certainly those men, as American citizens, have a right to express their views for or against any measure as they see fit. However, I assert that it is not very persuasive to have a Communist shout that the selective training and service bill is undemocratic and un-American.

Certainly not all those who are opposed to this measure are Communists; no one would make so silly a contention as that; but, with equal certainty, I think it can be said that every Communist is opposed to it. As against this declaration of the Communists and of those who share their view that this bill is un-American, let us put a few witnesses on the stand, and first George Washington.

If Washington felt that the principle involved in this bill would violate the spirit of the new Republic, which he had risked everything to establish, he would have stated his position, and his words would carry authority today whether or not we felt that under the changed conditions which now exist it was possible to follow them fully. But on May 2, 1783, Washington submitted to Alexander Hamilton, by request, an article entitled "Sentiments on a peace establishment," discussing a permanent peace establishment for this country, the Revolutionary War then being at an end. Hamilton was at that time chairman of a committee of Congress on a peace establishment. This document is a complete and well-reasoned argument, as, of course, would be expected. From it I quote merely these significant words of Washington:

> It may be laid down as a primary position, and the basis of our system, that every citizen who enjoys the protection of a free government, owes not only a proportion of his property, but even of his personal services to the defense of it, and consequently that the citizens of America (with a few legal and official exceptions) from 18 to 50 years of age should be borne on the militia rolls, provided with uniform arms, and so far accustomed to the use of them, that the total strength of the country might be called forth at a short notice * * * for these purposes they ought to be duly organized into commands of the same formation. * * * They ought to be regularly mustered and trained.

I end the quotation there, although the entire document covering many pages is well worth reading. George Washington saw nothing un-American in the idea that every citizen owes a duty to prepare himself and submit to being prepared to render the fullest possible service to his country. He did not fear that if we should take the entire manpower of this country from 18 to 50 years of age, provide them with arms, organize them into troops and companies, see that they were mustered and drilled, it would make this country a militaristic nation. His argument it seems to me is just as effective today as when it was uttered.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator, of course, is familiar with the repeated supplications of Washington while Commander in Chief of the Revolutionary army to the Congress to furnish him an army, and it is probably true that if Washington had had the sort of army which he asked the Continental Congress to provide for him he would have won the Revolutionary War in 2 years instead of 7 or 8.

Mr. BURKE. I have no doubt the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky is substantiated by the facts of history.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President——

Mr. BURKE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I understood the Senator to say the statement of General Washington was made in 1783?

Mr. BURKE. It was made on May 2, 1783.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. That was several years before the adoption of the Constitution?

Mr. BURKE. Yes; I realize that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Does the Senator know whether George Washington ever made any such statement after the formation of the Republic?

Mr. BURKE. Yes; in 1790 there was proposed to the Congress a bill built upon this principle. I understand, although I should not want to vouch definitely for the statement, that it had the full support of the then President, but the Congress did not enact the measure. However, in the bill introduced in the Congress in 1790 I think the idea of selective compulsory training in time of peace was embodied, which gives rise to the comment made earlier in the day when this matter was mentioned that if George Washington, with all the power he possessed, with all the love and admiration of the people of the country, was not able to have such a measure written into the law the Military Affairs Committee and those who favor this measure have a very serious task on their hands. It must be remembered, however, that in 1790 this country was at peace. There were some things threatening, but we were looking forward to a long period of peace, and, so far as the Members of Congress and the citizenry of the country in general knew, there was nothing in the offing comparable to the condition which prevails in the world today, and nothing to indicate the necessity for military training such as confronts us today.

A further fact which we must consider is that in the pioneer period it was a very natural condition for the normal citizen to be familiar with the use of firearms, and, of course, to keep himself in good physical condition. Unpleasant as it may be to admit it, we must in frankness say that the Nation, as a whole, has become greatly softened. The need for rigorous discipline and military training is now on a scale and is apparent to a degree that would not have been true at all in 1783 or 1790.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Is it not true that at that time there was a constant danger from savage Indian tribes, and that European powers had colonies in the United States which were constantly threatening the peace and order of the country?

Mr. BURKE. There certainly was danger from hostile Indians. That was one of the things that undoubtedly accounted for the fitness in which the citizenry of the country kept themselves at all times. It was either a matter of being fit and able to defend themselves or probably not remaining very long on this earth. But there was not any world-wide disturbance. Although one was not far off, it was not apparent at that moment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. BURKE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not a fact that during Washington's administration there was a situation similar to the situation which is now existing and has recently existed in Europe of an attempt at conquest of the world by one man?

Mr. BURKE. That was toward the end of Washington's administration.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not a fact that there were parties in this country, one headed by Alexander Hamilton, just such a party as that new headed by Col. Julius Ochs Adler and his associates, trying to drag the United States into a war on behalf of Great Britain, and another party roaming up and down the country, with the French Ambassador at their head trying to drag the United States into the war on behalf of France? In other words, there was such a situation then that Americans were divided into parties, trying either to stay out of war or to drag the country into the war on behalf of one or the other set of belligerents?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. BURKE. I will yield in a moment. I would say, first, in answer to the Senator from Missouri, that I do not agree at all with his statement that Col. Julius Ochs Adler or the others he mentions have done anything or have any thought in their minds of dragging us into war. They believe in preparedness of the citizens to resist aggression.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the Senator read the New York Times?

Mr. BURKE. I read it every day.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If he will read it any day he will see the efforts made on behalf of the newspaper controlled by Col. Ochs Adler, at least in large part, to drag the United States into war.

Mr. BURKE. Does the New York Times go any further than the President of the United States?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think it does; and let me say that, so far as I am concerned, I do not agree with the President in such speeches as that made at Charlottesville, calculated to drag the United States into war.

Mr. BURKE. I differ with the Senator from Missouri in that. I agree fully with the President in reference to his foreign policy.

I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Nebraska, but the Senator from Missouri referred to trouble in Europe. Most of that occurred under the administration of John Adams rather than that of George Washington.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I will ask the Senator to wait for a moment, please. The Senator from Nebraska yielded to me, and I have the floor for the time being.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Very well.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, Napoleon was in France creating a good deal of disturbance, but our own difficulties mostly occurred during the administration of John Adams, after Washington had gone out of office.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, it was during the administration of John Adams that we came to the verge of war and raised an Army for the purpose of fighting France, but during Washington's administration the French Minister was going up and down the country denouncing the President of the United States, who was George Washington, compelling Washington to demand the recall of Citizen Genêt, and it was during Washington's administration that the President of the United States was burned in effigy on one side for not getting into war on behalf of Great Britain, and burned in effigy on the other side for not getting into war on behalf of France.

Mr. BURKE. In what part of Washington's administration?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. During his second administration.

Mr. BURKE. The period I am referring to now was in 1790 when Washington was still in his first term. It is true that before Washington's 8 years were up the world was aflame. Those who say that in an emergency it is all right for a President of the United States to continue in office indefinitely, and that we cannot draw any conclusion from the example set by Washington, overlook the fact, as the Senator from Missouri has just pointed out, that, at the end of Washington's administration, the world was in a very serious condition, and yet General Washington felt that he could safely turn the helm of the ship of state over to another citizen, though not setting it on a different tack.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit one further interruption I will not interrupt him any more.

Mr. BURKE. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator will recall that immediately after Washington had retired from the Presidency in the midst of a grave crisis during the Adams administration he was authorized to raise several divisions of troops for possible use against France, of which troops General Washington was nominally the commander, although General Hamilton was the actual commander; and that was done by voluntary enlistment and not by conscription.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I proceed.

The principle outlined by Washington in 1783 in his article entitled "Sentiments on a Peace Establishment" forms the solid basis upon which this bill is constructed. It affords a workable program for translating into action the obligation which rests, as Washington said, upon every citizen who enjoys the protection of this free Government to contribute of his personal service to the defense of it. Senators may take their choice of witnesses as to whether compulsory peacetime military training of the citizen is in accord with the fundamental principle of American liberty. I prefer Washington. With him, the sponsors of this legislation declare that it forms the very basis of our proper peace establishment.

I shall omit some of the other witnesses on this particular point, and come down over a long span of years to the Progressive Party in 1916. There are some Members of the Senate, and some I believe within the sound of my voice, who thought that a good deal of wisdom and patriotism, and certainly an understanding of Americanism, was represented in the Progressive Party of 1912 and 1916. Whether one agrees with much or little of the things for which the Bull Moose Party stood for, it cannot be questioned that its membership ranked as high in patriotic devotion to American ideals as any group that ever assembled in this country. The Progressive platform adopted at Chicago on June 8, 1916, contains as splendid an exposition of Americanism as can be found anywhere in our literature. My attention has never been called to any pronouncement of the Communist Party that comes within hailing distance of it. Let me read a few excerpts from that platform:

As members of an international community we are subject to certain basic duties:

To secure the rights and equal treatment of our citizens, native or naturalized, on land and sea, without regard to race, creed, or nativity.

To guard the honor and uphold the just influence of our Nation.

To maintain the integrity of international law.

These—

The platform says—

are the cornerstones of civilization. We must be strong to defend them.

* * * * * * *

Then the platform goes on:

Whatever our country can legitimately do to attain peace for war-stricken Europe and to aid in the procurement of equal rights without discrimination because of race or creed to all men in all lands should be done.

Adequate provision for the common defense has become the task of foremost national concern.

* * * * * * *

And then this final section:

We must be ready in spirit, arms, and industry. Preparation in arms requires:

Remember, this was in 1916—

A Navy restored to at least second rank in battle efficiency.

A Regular Army of 250,000 men fully armed and trained, as a first line of land defense.

And then, and most important, this significant statement:

A system of military training adequate to organize with promptness behind that first line of the Army and Navy a citizen soldiery supplied, armed, and controlled by the National Government.

In our democracy every male citizen is charged with the duty of defending his country. This duty is not new. It has existed from the foundation of the Government. Under modern conditions it cannot be performed without military training. Service without training means slaughter and disaster. As the Nation has always recognized and exercised the right to enforce compulsory military service in time of war, so should there be universal military training for that service during times of peace.

That is the last quotation I give from that very able platform, adopted during another period when the world was in very great stress. I wish every Member of this body and every individual in the country would realize the full significance of that language used by those very able leaders of the Progressive Party, that "service without training means slaughter and disaster"—I am going to talk a little more about that later—and then their solemn declaration that—

As the Nation has always recognized and exercised the right to enforce compulsory military service in time of war, so should there be universal military training for that service during times of peace.

Those patriotic Americans could see nothing undemocratic or un-American in universal military training for service in times of peace.

General Pershing, of course, should have been called and was called and appeared before the committee as a witness. His view, I think, will be accepted by most Americans as being rather convincing on what is or is not American. In his letter to the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], which appears on page 5 of the printed record of the hearings, General Pershing heartily endorses the principles embodied in this bill. So do a great host of others across the country whose devotion to Americanism cannot be questioned.

It is unnecessary to go further with the presentation of witnesses to establish that compulsory military training in time of peace is in full accord with the best American tradition. It is the only democratic way to provide an adequate national defense. It recognizes the obligation of all to serve, and adequately to train for that service. Rich and poor, all classes, races, and creeds, are treated with exact and equal justice. Instead of being contrary to the principles of American liberty and freedom, this proposal is implicit with the true spirit of Americanism.

In closing this part of my presentation, I offer a resolution adopted on June 14, shortly before this measure was filed in Congress. I offer it as typical of scores, probably hundreds, of others from all sorts of groups and organizations scattered over the country. The resolution is short:

Resolved, That we, those alumni, faculty, and undergraduates of Williams College who are assembled at a meeting at Williamstown this 14th day of June 1940, believing that the result of the war now raging in Europe will affect the lives of us all and of the generations succeeding us, and further believing that the security of the United States of America is threatened by the events at this moment occurring abroad, do hereby petition Congress to enact immediately legislation providing for universal compulsory military training, and for universal service in time of war, as the only way to defend this country adequately, in time and in a manner befitting a democracy.

There is no suggestion on the part of those undergraduates, alumni, and faculty members of that great historic institution that we should wait for more weeks and more months to see if eventually the required number might volunteer, so that selective service would not be needed.

I understand that there is some question about the figures in reference to the number of enlistments during different periods. I stated, in asking the Senator from Michigan to yield not long ago, that I was informed—and I have the official statement—that during the first 5½ months of this year there was a net increase of our National Army of only 14,500, approximately. I understand that those figures are questioned, and at least their validity, or the validity of the conclusion, is open to some question because, during a part of that period, at least, the Army was not seeking any additional enlistments. But I waive all of that. Let the figures be what they are, and let us take the last figures given. As I understood the distinguished Senator from Michigan to say, during the month of July, if I recall correctly, the volunteer enlistments exceeded 31,000, which set an all-time record, at least in peacetime, for enlistments in the Army; and that is certainly a very encouraging and creditable showing. But if we need—and as to that need there will be discussion later—400,000 men October 1, and another 400,000 the 1st of April, to put them into training, even this all-time peace record of 31,000 in 1 month would be altogether inadequate, as it would take, unless my computation is in error, 12 months at that figure to get the first 400,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The 31,000 the Senator from Michigan referred to are simply the enlistments in the Army. To that number must be added the enlistments in the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Air Corps, and all the other branches of the armed forces. The 31,000 enlistments are in only one branch of the armed forces.

Mr. BURKE. As stated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], there has been no difficulty in getting enlistments in the Navy. The testimony clearly indicates that they get all of the enlistments they want. In fact, in the Navy there is a waiting list; and the enlistment period in the Navy is 6 years, which may be worth consideration in weighing the validity of the argument that a reduction of the enlistment period in the Army from 3 years to 1 year would settle our difficulties.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado and Mr. MILLER addressed the Chair.

Mr. BURKE. I yield first to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I merely wanted to state that the 400,000 who will be needed on October 1 are for all the branches of the armed forces, including the Navy and the marines and other military establishments.

Mr. BURKE. That is correct. They are to go into training for all branches of the service.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. It appears to me that under the theory of the bill it is not necessarily material whether or not the volunteer system has broken down or whether it is functioning properly. Section 2 of the bill merely provides for the registration of a certain class of people between the ages of 21 and 31. Then section 3—and I wish to call the Senator's special attention to it—beginning with line 15, on page 15, authorizes the President—

> Whether or not a state of war exists, to select for training and service in the manner herein provided, and to induct into the land and naval forces of the United States, such number of men between such ages as in his judgment is required for such forces in the national interest.

That does not mean that because a million men, or 2,000,000 men, or 4,000,000 men may be registered, any more will be called into the service than are necessary in the national interest. The bill further provides, in the same section, that the volunteer system may be in force.

I have great respect for those Senators who are opposing the conscription theory, but it seems to me this is not a conscription bill, but is merely a measure setting up machinery to provide an ample reservoir of manpower which may be drawn upon by the President at such times as the national interest demands. That, in my opinion, is the crux of the entire bill, for section 5 provides that no man can be called into service until an appropriation is made by the Congress to pay for his services. I submit to the Senator, who has had no small part in the preparation of the bill, that all it is proposed to do is to provide a reservoir from which the manpower may be drawn if circumstances arise which make it imperative in the national interest that the reservoir be tapped. Is that correct, or is it not?

Mr. BURKE. The Senator is entirely correct and states the matter most forcefully, embodying the very heart and essence of the bill. It retains the volunteer system, with a little different age limit, the ages being from 18 to 35.

Any young man may volunteer after the bill goes into effect. It sets up the machinery for classification, so as to get an inventory of the manpower of the country, but it will never go beyond that point if the hopes of all of us that the voluntary system will be adequate are realized. While we talk about 400,000 on October 1, that is merely what the Chief of Staff and other officers of the Army and the Navy and other recognized officials say they want, and they state that they can be prepared by October 1 with housing, clothing, arms, and other facilities to take 400,000 men. But if we pass the pending measure and set up an organization for listing the manpower of the country, before we come to applying the rule of compulsion, or the rule of selection, the Senate and the House must make an appropriation. That is specifically provided in section 6 of the bill, which reads:

> The President shall have no authority to induct persons into the land and naval forces of the United States under this act until Congress shall hereafter appropriate funds specifically for such purpose.

So if we pass the bill, when September comes, or the 1st of October, Congress can then have before it the record of enlistment during the intervening weeks, and if it is satisfied that the enlistments are speeding up and that at that time there is no necessity to make any appropriation to call a single man into the service under the selective process. Congress need not make an appropriation, but the machinery will be available. If, a few months later, the need is greater, or the enlistments fall off, and it is necessary to get men under the selective system, we will not have a long and costly delay.

Mr. MILLER. As a matter of fact, we passed the National Guard bill, and if all the National Guard units are filled and are called into training it may not be necessary, under the program, to call a single man under the pending bill for months. But if such conditions develop as to make it unwise to call all the units of the National Guard into training, and four or five hundred thousand men are required in the interest of national defense, we will still have this reservoir from which to fill the requirements.

Mr. BURKE. I understand it will be possible to call 400,000 men October 1, in addition to the National Guard. It may be inadvisable or unnecessary, but I think if the Senator had in mind the ability to provide clothing, housing, shelter, and arms, that has already been taken into consideration, as the National Guard bill was considered from the start as an integral part of the selective-service program. From the very beginning it was understood that in order to make it workable at all it was necessary to call the National Guard into active duty, and with that realization the Chief of Staff and others said they still would be able to take 400,000 men on the 1st of October. But it may be altogether unnecessary or inadvisable to do so at that time.

Mr. MILLER. They will be able to take them, provided the Congress authorizes them to do so by further appropriation.

Mr. BURKE. That is absolutely necessary.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. It has been frequently stated that the Government would call 400,000 men on the 1st of October under the draft law; that that was the purpose of the law. Has the Senator any figures showing that we could, under the draft law, get that number of men by that time? I have had occasion to refer to the draft law of 1917, and I find that, while the law was approved on the 20th of May, it was September before 250,000 men were inducted into the Army, and October before 400,000 were inducted. So, unless we can proceed faster than in 1917—unless there was some reason for the delay at that time—it would be December or January before we could get these men inducted under the selective draft. Has the Senator any figures on that question?

Mr. BURKE. Yes. That matter was gone into very fully before the committee. We would start very considerably further along the road than was the case in 1917, because the Joint Army and Navy Committee have already had the matter fully organized. Major Hershey testified before the committee, and his testimony will be found in the report of the hearings. They have at least made very great progress in being ready to start without any delay. Of course, it is true that if Congress finds it necessary to debate this matter at very great length, undoubtedly it will be necessary to extend the time from October 1 to October 15 or November 1, or whatever the time might be, and, I assume that is one of the things those who are inclined to indulge in long debate will have to weigh, whether they wish to run the risk of delaying the matter. Certainly we should have full discussion of the measure.

Mr. TAFT. They acted very quickly in 1917, because the registration was begun the 5th of June, which was within 2 weeks of the approval of the act, and still there was the long process of appointing draft boards. Setting up the clerical forces necessary to register the men and to determine whether they should be deferred or should not be deferred took, under the pressure of war, 4 months to accomplish. So it seems to me we have no reason to think that the proposed draft law would provide 400,000 men before the 1st of January 1941.

Mr. BURKE. I do not propose to set my judgment against that of General Marshall, General Shedd, Major Hershey, and the others who testified that if Congress passed the bill around the middle of August they would be able, in the light of experience they have had, and in view of the steps already taken, to take care of 400,000 men on October 1.

Mr. TAFT. I have understood that the need of passing the bill is that we must have 400,000 men on October 1. Not only do I think we will not get them under the proposed draft law, but, as I understand the Senator's present statement, no effort is to be made even to try to get them. For 3 or 4 months the voluntary system will be tested before they undertake the draft.

Mr. BURKE. No, indeed; the Senator misunderstood my statement entirely if he reached that conclusion. I say that in the bill as it now stands there is a provision for continuing the voluntary system. If the bill shall be passed, the Government will proceed immediately to the first step, which is the registration of all men within the specified group. The second important step will be the classification, so that we may know what our manpower is. All that will be done whether or not enlistments come in fully the first week to take care of the required number. We will know about that, anyway.

Some may say that will be a waste of money and a waste of effort. I do not think so at all. I think that if we have to apply the selective compulsory system, all those steps will be out of the way. Then the final step of drawing the numbers and calling the men in is a matter which will require only a short time. If the enlistments are not up to the proper mark, that last step will be taken by the 1st of October.

Mr. TAFT. Does not the Senator think that if the bill shall be passed all interest of the administration and the Army in the voluntary system will cease, and that the voluntary system will not have a fair trial? Does not the Senator think that, with the easy method provided, if merely by a stroke of a pen it will be possible to get 400,000 men, efforts to make the volunteer system work will lose all force?

Mr. BURKE. On the contrary, I think that exactly the opposite would result, that the very fact that Congress had applied itself in the past and worked out an effective compulsory draft measure, to go into operation on a certain day, and that registrations and classification were taking place, would of itself in a very helpful, sane way provide a tremendous impetus to voluntary enlistment, and would be much better for the country than to go out with bands and white feathers and everything else and try to stir up enlistments.

Mr. TAFT. In other words, no real effort will be made in any serious way by the administration to get volunteer enlistments. The administration will simply rely on the fact that the draft is threatened, and so enlistments will increase, as I understand the Senator's position. There will be no general appeal, no general effort, no statement by the President, no real calling attention, not to the patriotic duty, but to the advantages the Army has, if we change the limits and change the enlistment period?

Mr. BURKE. I cannot speak for the President, and say whether or not he will make a fireside chat. I hope he will not. If the bill is passed I hope there will be no organized concerted effort in the newspapers, and in the movies, or on the street corners to bring about an increase in voluntary enlistment. There is only one way to do that, and that is to create a war spirit. Those who are trying in their serious and honorable way to hold down the war spirit ought to be the enthusiastic supporters of this measure, because when we shall have passed it we can do away with all hysteria and everything else connected with putting on a recruiting drive. We will all recognize then that we shall simply have the serious task of registering those within the age limits, of enrolling them, and classifying them, and sending them into training, and we shall get away almost completely from the hysteria that otherwise must result.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Most of the prominent opponents of the bill assert that it is perfectly sound to draft men in time of war. If it is sound to draft men to fight a war, why is it not sound to draft men to keep us out of war?

Mr. BURKE. I will answer that by saying I believe one principle is just as sound as the other, though I suppose some opponents of the measure may give a different answer.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. BURKE. Yes, indeed.

Mr. TAFT. From the first part of the Senator's speech do I understand that he is in favor of the passage of the bill regardless of any war emergency simply because compulsory military training is necessary for the hardening of the youth, presumably?

Mr. BURKE. I think it would be fully justifiable on that ground, but I admit that if all the world was at peace and our minds were directed along other lines, I would not urge the passage of such a measure with any hope that it would be enacted. However, I think a good deal could be said for it even under such conditions.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I heard the Senator's statement a moment ago about the provision of section 6 of the bill that the President may not induct anyone into the service under the bill until Congress shall have appropriated the money.

Mr. BURKE. Specifically for that purpose.

Mr. BONE. Specifically for that purpose. So that is as specific as the English language can make it. Are we to understand from that, that regardless of any other consideration, no man will be inducted into the military service of the United States under the bill until the Congress shall have actually passed an appropriation measure for that specific purpose? What will be done with funds available to be employed by the Army? Are they to remain in statu quo? And if a million or two million young men, or five million, whatever number are registered——

Mr. BURKE. Twelve million.

Mr. BONE. What will they do? Will they simply go home and remain there until Congress appropriates the money to bring them into service after they are selected?

Mr. BURKE. Under no circumstances would more than a small percentage of those who register ever be called to service. Between the age limits now contained in the bill, 21 to 30, inclusive, there are approximately 12,000,000 men who will register. The Army wants only a trained reserve of 1,200,000 men altogether, so that a very large proportion of men who register will never do anything other than register, and be classified in A–1 or D–3, or some place else, and those men will know what the likelihood of their being called is as soon as they find out how they are classified.

Mr. BONE. I am glad to get that information, but the specific point on which I sought information is this: Will it be possible, under this legislation, if it shall be enacted, for a single man actually to be called for training, and inducted into the service, and put into a uniform, and be given training, unless the Congress shall pass the legislation making appropriation for that purpose?

Mr. BURKE. No.

Mr. BONE. So that if this legislation shall be passed, a second necessary step will have to be taken, and that is to provide the money to implement Senate bill 4164?

Mr. BURKE. Yes, that is correct, with the exception of setting up the machinery and registration organizations.

Mr. BONE. Where will that money come from?

Mr. BURKE. It will come from the general fund. That can all be done. Not a single man can be selected or inducted into the service until Congress appropriates the money for that purpose, but the rest of the work can be done.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We have already appropriated a lump sum of $400,000,000 as a sort of lagniappe, for the President to do with as he pleases. Can he take that $400,000,000 and use it to induct men into service?

Mr. BURKE. Certainly not, because the language is as plain as the English language can be, that the money must be specifically appropriated for this purpose.

I read it again:

SEC. 6. The President shall have no authority to induct persons into the land and naval forces of the United States under this act until Congress shall hereafter appropriate funds specifically for such purpose.

There can be no argument about it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask one more question. The Senator stated that very few of those to be registered will be called. How does the Senator know that? He says the Army wants only a reserve of 1,200,000. Of course, the Army's desires are on a rising scale. When they find they can get a certain number they ask for a certain number more. Originally they wanted a standing Army of 300,000; then they went up to 500,000; and then up to a million.

The Senator will well recall that in the last war it was stated at first that we would not have to send any troops overseas. When we declared war the assurance was given on every hand that the Allies did not want any men sent overseas; that they simply wanted our moral and material aid. Then as soon as we got into the war they said they needed a few token divisions to be sent over simply to show that we actually had our hearts in the war and so that the American flag could appear on the western front. We passed a draft law more or less with the understanding that only a few troops were to be sent, but as we got a little farther in the Army raised its sights a little bit more, and the necessities of the situation developed a little bit more, and the first thing we knew we had 4,000,000 men in uniform.

It seems to me that if we are to pass the bill at all we should not do it on the assumption of telling the American people that only a few men out of the 12,000,000 registered will be called. It is said that the Army wants 400,000 men, but the Senator has no assurance that by the time we shall have passed the bill the Army will not have raised its sights and will want 800,000 men.

If the Congress believes in this bill it ought to be passed, but, of course, Congress ought not to pass it under a fradulent pretense that only a few out of the 12,000,000 registered will actually be called, because no one knows how large the demand will be.

Mr. BURKE. There is no fraud or pretense whatever. What the Army wants will have nothing to do with the matter except to form the basis of the request for an appropriation by Congress. When the request comes to Congress to make an appropriation, if the Senator from Missouri is here, he will be able to say, "The Army now wants 1,500,000 men instead of 1,200,000, and I am not in favor of giving them the 300,000 additional men," and he will undoubtedly be able to keep the Army to the smaller force.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I doubt that very much. The Senator from Missouri will undoubtedly be here if he is alive, and the Senator from Missouri will undoubtedly oppose this tremendous expansion. But I have seen committees of the Senate and committees of the House, appropriations committees and military and naval affairs committees, often roll over and play dead, often reverse themselves. An Army officer or a naval officer may appear before a committee and say, "There is a national emergency. We have to do thus and so." Then the officer may come back the next week and say, "We did not ask for half enough last week. We asked for only $2,000,000,000 last week. We ned $4,000,000,000 more this week." And the committees have often reversed their previous action. I have seen that happen so often I have no delusions that my feeble voice will prevent it in the future.

Mr. BURKE. I think I should qualify the statement I made to this extent; that certainly under the machinery set up by the bill, if Congress was convinced that the conditions demanded it, and was willing to appropriate the money, probably 10,000,000 men could be inducted into the Army. As the bill now stands there are about 12,000,000 in this classification. We will assume that 2,000,000 will be physically, mentally, or otherwise unfit, or conscientious objectors. That would leave certainly 10,000,000 men. It would be possible, certainly under this machinery, to bring into the Army 10,000,000 men. I hope that if the future of American civilization depends upon it, Congress will make the appropriation to bring the full 10,000,000 men into the Army, and lower the 21-year age limit, and raise the 31-year age limit, to obtain whatever other millions may be needed.

But what I was saying—and it has nothing to do with that—is that the present exigencies of the country's needs seem to call now for 400,000 men for training October 1, and an additional 400,000 for training April 1 next year. That is all I can say for the present.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, let me add one word of information. The Appropriations Committee has also had submitted to it a list of matériel and equipment for 4,000,000 men. That is already in the committee's hands.

Mr. BURKE. I think that was a very wise course. The Congress is not now asked to make an appropriation, but is advised as to what will be needed if we reach the point where we must take this matter more seriously than some appear to be taking it.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. It is unfortunate that those who oppose the bill are so quick to take the floor and say that the provisions they do not like are based upon fraud and that anyone who is in favor of the bill must either be dense or trying to put over on the Congress and the people of the United States some sort of fraudulent scheme.

It further seems to me, Mr. President, that there is some merit in the suggestion that if we are to have so many soldiers we must have authority from Congress. I am old-fashioned enough to believe that the Congress has some jurisdiction. If the Army wants something, I do not think Congress ought to sit down supinely and say, "Yes; if you generals want all this money, we will give it to you." I have noticed at times that the Appropriations Committee has not been very liberal in giving some of us what we want. That is especially true when the distinguished Senator from Colorado heads the subcommittee in the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. ADAMS. I appreciate the compliment; but in the Appropriations Committee this morning the Army representatives said to us that the House had appropriated exactly what they asked for in this modest $5,000,000,000 bill. That branch of the Government did not attempt to trim the appropriation. Some of us will try—perhaps unsuccessfully—to trim it.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. It is probably merely a coincidence when two intelligent bodies happen to agree on the amount of a necessary appropriation. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I notice from the hearings that Colonel Adler advocates training 2,000,000 men a year until we have a reservoir of 20,000,000 trained men at the end of 10 years. Of course, the bill makes that possible.

Mr. BURKE. The machinery is set up to train every able-bodied man between the ages of 21 and 31 who cannot claim exemption on the ground that he is a Member of Congress, a conscientious objector, or is in one of several other classes. I assume, if we take them all, that we shall have about 10,000,000 all told, and that number would be added to at the rate of about 1,200,000 a year by those who come within the age limits. I suppose theoretically the bill provides the machinery to train them all if Congress thinks it is necessary and appropriates the money.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator agree with Colonel Adler that that should be done?

Mr. BURKE. I agree with General Marshall, General Shedd, and others who feel that if we have a well-trained reserve of about 1,200,000, with the Regular Army increased to the size at present authorized, under present conditions that is about as far as we should go.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator agree with the views of the Assistant Secretary of War, Judge Patterson, that we should today have 1,300,000 men under arms?

Mr. BURKE. I think we should have that many in training.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator mean that in the Regular Army and in training we should have 1,300,000 men?

Mr. BURKE. I think that as quickly as possible we should try to have between a million and a million and a half. We cannot be definite about the matter. I think the proper number is between a million and a million and a half.

Mr. TAFT. I noticed a week ago Sunday that Judge Patterson unequivocally laid down the need for the United States to have an Army of 1,300,000 men under arms. He did not say anything about training. He said we needed that number. He said we needed 850,000 for a mobile Army, 150,000 in garrisons, and 150,000 for some other purpose. He said that we should have under arms an actual Army of 1,300,000 men. I wonder if the Senator agrees with that view.

Mr. BURKE. I should be very greatly persuaded by the views of Judge Patterson, now the Assistant Secretary of War, whom I consider one of the ablest public servants who has ever come to Washington, a man with vital experience in military matters, and a far more thorough knowledge than I have. I should certainly weigh his statement with very great care. He goes a little further than I had thought was necessary; but if he is convinced that his figures are correct, I should certainly wish to examine them with great care and humility, in deference to his superior judgment in the matter.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I wish to ask the Senator a general question. I do not wish to intrude it in the midst of the Senator's remarks and interfere with the current of his thought. I intended to ask the question after the Senator should have concluded.

Mr. BURKE. I shall be glad to have the question asked now.

Mr. BONE. I suppose that in common with a great many others who have been following the debates in Congress and in the press of the country about the proposal to register young men for service, the Senator has noticed the continued assertion that the times in which we are living call for a great sacrifice on the part of all the American people—on the part of the general public, as well as on the part of business. That necessity has been emphasized many times. In one of the local newspapers this morning there appeared an editorial to the effect that the troubled waters in which we are swimming call for a very great sacrifice—a real, and not an ostensible or outward sacrifice—on the part of every American. I wonder if the Senator agrees that that is a true statement of the condition which confronts us.

Mr. BURKE. I think the times are such that it is imperative that every citizen of this free country should realize that he owes everything he has—his life, his property, and everything else—to the cause of preserving the liberties which we cherish, and that so far as is necessary our organized society in the United States has the right to call upon him to make that sacrifice. The matter of calling upon us to go into training, under conditions which will be prescribed, in order that we may fit ourselves to render that service, involves only a minor sacrifice. If the Senator is referring to taxing profits——

Mr. BONE. I am.

Mr. BURKE. If the Senator is referring to taxing profits, or property, or anything else, I say that every citizen, so far as his life and property are concerned, must realize that if the need should arise, he must make the full contribution in whatever way is most effective. I entirely approve the principle of excess-profits taxes, drafting money, or forcing loans in time of war. The only question I shall have in my mind in approaching any specific proposal of that kind will be, "Is this the practical, feasible, and wise way to accomplish the desired results?" Whenever I reach a conclusion on that question, I shall go the whole way.

Mr. BONE. I was prompted to ask the question because I have served on one rather important committee in which the question was seriously raised by representatives of the National Defense Council that men manufacturing airplanes and warships could not be expected to be enthusiastic in the rearmament program—that they might, to use a vulgarism, pull back in the traces and not give the enthusiastic service they otherwise would give—unless there were guaranteed to them what I should call a considerable measure of profit. There was no suggestion of sacrifice. On the contrary, it was as cold, hard, and ruthless a business proposition as I have ever listened to—and I have represented businessmen all my professional life. Aside from the discussion of the necessities of the country, the whole thing revolved around whether or not they were to be guaranteed what was described as a reasonable return, which seemed to me to be quite generous in the light of the sacrifice we may have to impose on the boys who go into the Army. I am wondering if all the sacrifice about which newspaper publicists talk is to be the sacrifice of the boys.

Mr. BURKE. Certainly not.

Mr. BONE. I do not want it that way; and I am wondering how much of this talk is real and how much is unreal, amounting almost to hypocrisy. We read articles in the newspapers about the necessity for everybody sacrificing, and the necessity for the sacrifice being real and not apparent. In the next breath we are assured that we cannot have the whole procedure of preparedness carried on in a decent and effective way unless we guarantee sizeable profits to the men who are to make the instrumentalities of war. A great question is raised in my mind as to whether or not all the sacrifice is to be on the part of the boys.

I am not tilting a lance against business, but I am frankly questioning in my own mind the validity of much of the argument when the emphasis is laid on the necessity for large profits for munitions makers, and the emphasis for sacrifice is with respect to the service of the boys in the Army. If we take a young man away from a $200-, $300-, or $400-a-month job and put him in the Army at $21 a month, the sacrifice is regarded as a patriotic gesture on his part; but we cannot go out to the west coast and ask airplane manufacturers to make a comparable sacrifice.

I feel that the suggestion I am making is very logical and very legitimate, because I know that the Senator from Nebraska is aware of the history of the two major parties, both of which, with pontifical solemnity, have announced in their platforms—which we occasionally read for the amusement of ourselves and the general public—that if a sacrifice is to be made by so-called cannon fodder, then business must make identically the same sacrifice.

The Senator is aware of the wording of those platform declarations, is he not?

Mr. BURKE. I have not in mind the exact language.

Mr. BONE. They are much more emphatic than anything I could utter. They say, "In case of war"—and we are assured that this is virtually a state of war now—"we call upon the country to make a draft of property"—and they use this language, or its equivalent—"exactly as we draft men."

I do not know whether or not these parties were "kidding" the American people. I suspect, I will admit to the Senator, I have a deeply ingrained suspicion, that they were "kidding" the country, because there has not been evinced on the part of Congress in this whole program a single intention, so far as I have been able to determine, to draft property as we now propose to draft the services of young men; and I am wondering why these two great parties are now defaulting in their solemn promise to the American people.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President——

Mr. BONE. I do not know whether or not it is the part of wisdom to do it. I am simply saying that both these parties lied to the American people when they made that pledge unless they now, in the face of this crisis, have the sand and the courage and the intestinal fortitude to make good on their solemn pledges.

Perhaps a party platform is not a pledge. I do not know. After I see what conventions do, I have reached the conclusion that it is so much opera bouffe—not even grand opera; just the lower order of English music-hall comedy. But they ought not to do it; and my purpose in questioning the Senator was to ascertain whether or not he felt that in order to be square with the American people we ought to make the sacrifice of business somewhat comparable to the sacrifice of the boys who go into the service.

I have a little fellow who may have to go. The Senator may have one who may have to go. Nobody will stand here and say that my boy has a right to have an assurance of his pre-war or pre-service earnings. Those are taken from him, if he has any. But there is not a Senator on this floor who will not agree with me that in the Military Affairs Committee and the Naval Affairs Committee the one problem we are facing now is how to assure business profits, and good profits, during this whole program.

What is our answer to that sort of a picture? I want the Senator to tell me why he thinks the publicists in this country who are writing about this subject do not attempt to say to the American people that business should make a sacrifice as well as the boys. I think we ought to illuminate that subject for the American people, or else we, as a Senate, should pass a resolution asking the parties, in the name of God, to quit putting that sort of stuff in their platforms. It is a disgrace.

Mr. BURKE. I have no doubt that the phase of the matter just so elcquently discussed by the Senator from Washington will be fully presented in the committees and on the floor of the Senate when the appropriate legislation is before Congress. I will say to him only, as I said before, that I feel that his fundamental proposition is absolutely sound and proper—I do not see how anyone could dispute it—that if we call upon the manhood of this country, the young men and the older men, to go into training in order to fit themselves to render the highest measure of service of which they are capable, certainly we have the right to call upon the owners of property, business, to do their utmost also to see that the program is made successful. But that does not mean at all to me that I should espouse at once any high-sounding clatter about drafting wealth in the country, and interfering with the processes by which alone we can hope to make war succeed. I want to see the specific proposals and examine them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the Senator think it is very significant and striking that in the program of legislation now before Congress the measure for conscripting the youth of the country, to be made cannon fodder if need be, immediately precedes the bill which is designed to repeal every limitation which Congress in its wisdom heretofore has imposed on excessive war profits from the manufacture of munitions, and the bill designed to permit munition manufacturers to amortize the establishments for which the Government is subsidizing them, either directly or by contract, over a period of 5 years? In other words, is it not significant that we first pass the bill to conscript the young boys of the country and send them off to the Army, and then the next week bring in a bill to remove every limitation on profits which may be made by the shipbuilders and munition makers, and suspend the tax laws in their behalf so as to permit them to amortize these excessive earnings over a period of 5 years?

Mr. BURKE. I do not like to have the Senator criticize this program, or me in connection with it, for drafting the young boys of the country for "cannon fodder," as he says. I do not like that expression, but we will let that pass.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, what is the bill for if that is not its purpose?

Mr. BURKE. The bill I introduced provided age limits from 18 to 65, and there was a great hue and cry by many of those now opposing the measure that we were covering too much territory; we were stirring up a war spirit, and so forth. So the committee, after considering the whole matter, reduced the ages to 21 to 31. I say, it does not seem to me quite fair to criticize me in that connection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I certainly did not mean to be unfair to the Senator. I think making the lower limit 21 instead of 18 was a very great improvement in the Senator's bill because, as bad as I think the bill is at present, it would have been infinitely worse to draft a lot of poor boys who were not even able to go to the polls and express themselves. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). The Senator from Nebraska will suspend for a moment. The Chair will advise the guests in the galleries that it is a direct violation of the rules of the Senate for the occupants of the galleries to manifest approval or disapproval by applause or in any other way. The Chair will ask the guests to conform strictly to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. One moment; I have one more word to say to the Senator from Missouri.

If the Senator from Missouri had read the bill which I introduced, or if those in the galleries who apparently support his position had taken the trouble to read it, they would have found that there was never any provision in the bill for taking for 8 months' training, as it was originally—now a year's training—the boys between 18 and 21. The bill provided that those subject to draft were between the ages of 21 and 45, and I wish that provision were still in the bill. Then, in order to have the inventory of the manpower of the Nation complete, and to make some other provisions, we had those of the ages from 18 to 21 and from 45 to 65 put into what we called the Home Guard unit, and provided that they should all register, but that no more would be done about the young group or the old group unless Congress later thought it advisable to make appropriations and organize home-defense units in the vicinity of the homes or the educational institutions where the young people were, or in the vicinity of the homes and employment where the older group were, so that they would be merely trained. So far as the sponsors of the bill are concerned there never was any intention to draft for military service even those between 18 and 21, but there again there has been very great complaint, some of it on the floor of the Senate, some saying that wars are always fought by the very young men, and that we are making a very great mistake in not taking the younger group into this draft, but I do not think so. I think we should extend the R. O. T. C. units in our colleges and the other means of military training for the young men, but make subject to draft as the bill does, only those who have passed their twenty-first birthday.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to make an observation in reply to what sounded like the insinuation of the Senator from Missouri that there was something significant about the fact that this bill is being proposed in advance of the tax bill which proposes to make some amendment of the present law with regard to profits. There could not be any significance attached to that fact unless Senators could conjure up a conspiracy between the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator let me interrupt him at that point?

Mr. BARKLEY. In a moment. This bill has been under consideration for weeks by the Committee on Military Affairs. The tax matter has been under consideration and under study by both the revenue-raising committees of the House and the Senate, and also the Treasury Department, ever since we passed the last tax bill, which was enacted some 6 or 8 weeks ago. It was recognized then that there would probably have to be levied what was called an excess-profits tax. I see no connection between the tax bill, which must originate in the House of Representatives, as the Senator from Missouri knows, and the pending bill, which could originate in either House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield further?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I certainly had no intention of making any insinuation whatever, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky. I was merely commenting on the significance of the juxtaposition of events which brings before the Congress in 1 week a bill for the drafting, for the conscription of the youth of the country, and brings before the Congress immediately after that a bill for exempting the shipbuilders and the munition makers from any limitation whatever on their profits, and allows them to amortize property which they will in large measure retain for their own benefit, and allows an exemption from taxation over a 5-year period. I do not charge any conspiracy, I do not insinuate any conspiracy, but it seems to me to be very significant of the trend of the events at this time in the Congress of the United States, that the conscription bill comes in one week, and an exemption of munition manufacturers as to profits and taxes comes in immediately following.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator may not insinuate that, but it seems to me that there would be significance in those two events only if there were collusion between the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate in bringing in the bills.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It does not make any difference which one comes first, the fact is that there is proposed a bill conscripting the youth of the country and sending them to war, and at the same time one proposing to remove any exemption on the tremendous profits of munition manufacturers and shipbuilders, and relieving them from taxation, and no amount of sophistry on the part of the Senator from Kentucky can remove the significance of the juxtaposition of those two measures.

Mr. BURKE. We can all see that this is an apparent effort to becloud the issue and cast discredit on the very essential military training bill, and not a serious effort to help meet the very great problems which confront the Congress and the country. What difference does it make which bill comes first, just so they have complete and fair consideration?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did not say it made any difference which one came first. The significance is that both of the bills are now pending, one to relieve the munition manufacturers from any limitation on profits, and exempt them from taxation, and the other to draft the manpower of the country.

Mr. BURKE. We have before us a bill for military training, and in due time, I take it, the other bill will be before us, and receive the same full and searching examination the pending bill is getting. I see nothing significant or collusive or reprehensible about the matter at all.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me make a further observation. In all probability the pending bill would have been here regardless of any tax bill, and the same thing is true of the tax bill; it would have been taken up and considered by the House committee if this bill had not been thought of. So that there cannot be any possible significance because of the fact that we have this bill before us and the House committee is considering a bill which they presumably will report within a few days.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I wanted to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he desired to have the bill go over until tomorrow or whether he can conclude today.

Mr. BURKE. I am enjoying the debate very much but will take possibly half an hour longer and will be willing to have the matter go over. But let me yield first to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BARKLEY. In view of what the Senator has said, I think that after he yields we had better suspend for the day.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I have attempted to ask the questions I have asked because, in common with others, I have read some of the tax proposals dealing with excess-profits taxes, and it makes me smile when I see the kind of sacrifices it is proposed to impose on some of the "boys" in the steel business and the other outfits furnishing war supplies.

For instance, if we should attempt to levy an excess-profits tax on profits in excess of those over a period of normal operations, they would pay to the Government the normal income tax on their incomes, and then 40 to 50 percent of the excess profits, and in this era of fat profits they could keep 50 percent of the excess for themselves. If anyone can find in that anything like a sacrifice, it seems to me he has a very deep and well-developed sense of humor.

I think if such provisions are written into the law they will constitute one of the beautiful ironies of the period. I would not want anything better if I were a businessman. I can understand the attitude of the gentlemen on the Advisory Commission, Mr. Stettinius and Mr. Knudsen, who have perhaps the viewpoint of the average big-business man, who feels that business must be protected; and I understand why they would translate that viewpoint, if possible, into legislation. It recalls the statement of Mr. du Pont, who said that during the World War his duty was that of a trustee for his stockholders, and that that came before the necessities of the United States. If the two had to be put side by side and measured, his trusteeship to his stockholders assumed the more ominous proportions in his own mind.

When the Senator says that he does not like this high-sounding clatter about taxing wealth, I agree with him; it was high-sounding clatter, but I quoted it from the platform of my own party. I do not know whether the Senator wants me now to say that my party was a bit oblique, or that the grand old Republican Party, with its noble traditions, made up of a bunch of fakers, put some high-sounding clatter over on the country. If it was high-sounding clatter, certainly the party of Abraham Lincoln announced the doctrine with pontifical solemnity, and if that is high-sounding clatter, we ought to say it was a fake and a fraud, and that we shall wash that aspect of political life out of the picture.

If no one else does, I see significance in the proposal for the abrupt removal of the ceiling on profits. I am a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and representatives of the Council of National Defense came before us recently and said we must remove the ceiling on profits of the airplane and warship manufacturers. I do not know what the significance of that is, but I think it is very significant.

I stood on the floor of the Senate a few days ago and called attention to a statement made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], who is an authority on the subject, who said that today the American dollar will buy twice as much as it would buy in 1920, and Republicans have risen on this floor and asked what became of the money that we have poured into national defense in recent years. Where did it go? Did it go down a rat hole? We appear to have obtained nothing for it, or at least that is the thesis of Republicans, that the country is utterly defenseless because we poured out millions and got nothing for them. I have great respect for the Senator from Oklahoma, who says that the dollar has this increased purchasing power. Yet we have poured out millions of dollars without the people getting what they ought to get. Where did the money go? We are today paying $75,000,000 for a battleship that could be produced a few years ago for $26,800,000. Do Senators wonder why I ask where the money is going? I want to know where it is going. If it would buy twice as much today as in 1920, we have a right to know whether we are being rooked.

If we do not settle down to a consideration of tax problems and quit juggling with excess profits, allowing munitions makers to get away with everything in sight, we will make a mess of the whole program; what we do will go down in history as what the Senator called it, "high-sounding clatter," and all the talk on this floor about the sacrifices on the part of the boys will be so much sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. It will not have any meaning except to those who utter it. At the same time we will do as we did before when we passed a war tax bill, which went into conference and was thrown into the ashcan right afterward. That tax was to apply only in wartime, but the conference committee of the Senate and the House threw it out. It did not apply to the present.

So, as the Senator from Missouri has said, we will soon have a bill come before us to remove all the ceilings on profits of airplane manufacturers, war-vessel manufacturers, powder manufacturers, but we will draft the boys and bring them into the service. I have no particular quarrel with some of the provisions of the pending bill, because I am one who thinks we are headed for war. I have said so repeatedly. I have said it in letters and on the floor. I think if the present business of fanning the flames continues longer, we will be in war very shortly. I am not saying that for the first time, but I said it a few days ago in answer to the Senator from Florida. This country is going into war, so the draft may come a few months later.

It is perhaps a moot question to discuss here now. However, every newspaper in the eastern part of the United States, day after day, contains editorials saying either that we are actually in war or that we ought to be in it, that we are taking a cowardly position by not getting in it, and we are yellow dogs because we do not declare war on Germany. Admiral Standley, not later than today, actually said that a state of war exists, and that we are cowardly if we do not declare war on Germany. If that sort of thing continues we will probably be in war, and then probably it will be a futile thing to discuss the draft, because it will be on on us, and along with the draft will come a dictatorship.

Mr. BURKE. If I share the views of the Senator from Washington that we are on the edge of war, nothing would prevent me from spending 24 hours a day in urging the enactment of the measure, because I can conceive of nothing more horrible than the responsibility and the guilt that would rest upon those who would send the country into war unprepared. But, if I may say a word further, I was not objecting—possibly I used an unfortunate expression—to the substance of anything the Senator from Washington or the Senator from Missouri had to say about the obligation we must put upon the owners of property and wealth. I want to examine those proposals when they come before us from the committees, as this proposal has. However, I think the discussion rather inapplicable at this time, because we are all agreed that we must strengthen our national defense, and that young men should be in the military service up to the numbers that Congress thinks necessary, either by voluntary enlistment or by the application of the selective-service principle. We will face the same obligation of taxing the wealth of the country, impounding the wealth of the country, whether it is in one form or another. Therefore I do not think the discussion is particularly appropriate in connection with this particular bill, but I welcome the interruptions, and shall be glad to have more of them tomorrow.

MILITARY COMPENSATION—STATEMENT BY RODES-RAPIER CO.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is obvious that the Senator from Nebraska cannot conclude his discussion today. I understand he wishes to continue his remarks tomorrow.

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I send to the desk a statement clipped from the Louisville Courier-Journal, containing not exactly an advertisement but a statement by the Rodes-Rapier Co., of Louisville. I think that every other private industry in the United States is going to do the same thing. I ask that the statement be read at the desk as showing an example of a high degree of patriotism and willingness to cooperate with our Government and all the people in the present emergency. I think as a good example it would be refreshing to have this statement read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The statement will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

MILITARY COMPENSATION

If the United States Congress decides that universal military training is the best method of defense for our security, we feel all of the burden should not fall on the young men—that the employer should do his part also.

Young men who have been employed here for 1 year or more who are selected for military training or service in the Army or Navy will not only be given their old positions here upon their return to civilian life but we will pay them in cash each month the difference between their salaries now at Rodes-Rapier Co. and the compensation allowed them by the Government during their training and service to their country.

RODES-RAPIER CO., INC.,
Fourth and Walnut.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to say simply that the Rodes-Rapier Co. is one of the oldest and most outstanding merchandising establishments in the State of Kentucky, and I am very happy to have their statement placed in the RECORD as an example of their conduct.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2009) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, AUGUST 12, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., pastor of Gunton Temple Memorial Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, Thou hast committed unto these Thy servants the solemn trust of government. May that trust never lose its luster and its sacred halo.

We pray that every duty may be diligently performed. When mountains of difficulty loom in our pathway may we be endowed with faith and courage to remove them. May trials and tribulations teach us to put our confidence in Thee. Give us such steadfastness of mind and heart that no unworthy affection or unholy purpose can ever drag us down and tempt us to break faith with our nobler and better self.

May this Nation be the honored instrument of God to bring in that blessed day when every need shall be supplied and righteousness shall flow everywhere as a mighty stream. To Thy name through Christ our Lord shall be the glory. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, August 8, 1940, was read and approved.

PROGRESS OF WORK FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the House Military Affairs Commitee, House Resolution 557.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 557

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the House of Representatives weekly a report giving a brief outline by the Advisory Commission to the Council of National Defense showing the progress of the work for the national defense.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. RICH. I do not know what this resolution would do; I do not know what its military value might be; but I should like to know from the gentleman from Kentucky, who is head of the Military Affairs Committee, the source of all the propaganda that is going on asking Members of Congress to vote for conscription. Can he tell us why there is all this war propaganda, war hysteria? We have heard a great deal about getting into war, and if we do not weigh our words and guard our tongue we will get into war. I, as a Member of Congress, have asked a great many other Members on both sides of the aisle, Who are we going to war, when are we going to war, and why; but I cannot find anybody who knows anything about it. As a Member of Congress I should like to know the reason for all this war hysteria and propaganda that is going on. Certainly the Members of Congress should be enlightened on this subject. I want no war with any nation for America. I am against a war of aggression with any nation.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the situation—and I get more letters perhaps than most men in Congress; they are running 600 or 700 and up to 1,000 a day—as I understand it the American people have a right to communicate with their Representatives and express their views. I think that is what they are doing. I am overwhelmed with it. I am not excited about it, but I think the situation that has developed in this country is due wholly to the conduct of a certain gentleman across the way—over in Germany.

Mr. RICH. Certainly the Members of Congress should be enlightened about this war hysteria. We are getting pleas every day to do this, to do that, and to do something else. We ought to know what the real object is.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to decline to yield further to the gentleman on this matter.

Mr. RICH. Can we not get enlightenment?

Mr. MAY. In view of the fact that the resolution was introduced by the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS], I think if she wants me to yield I must.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes; I ask the gentleman to yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that the gentleman from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, my privileged resolution calls for a weekly report as to the progress of our preparedness program from the President through the National Advisory Committee for National Defense. I believe the Members of Congress are entitled to this information. They now receive some information through the press; at present the press receives information before the Congress and that information is meager. I feel that greater consideration should be shown the Members who are the most direct representatives of the people. The people of the Nation are entitled to the information. They want to know exactly what is being done, how our defense program is coming along, and how the money is being spent. It is their money that is being spent and it may be that they and their families will pay with their lives if America be not prepared.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, answering the gentlewoman from Massachusetts, I may say that the War Department issues daily press releases which are available to all Members of Congress. These press releases show the progress of the program from time to time. In addition to that there is conducted on the air through the facilities of the National Broadcasting Co. on a Nation-wide hook-up of more than 100 stations round-table discussions by Mr. Knudsen and the other members of the committee on industrial mobilization and on the preparation of the war program.

Furthermore, the House Military Affairs Committee through the very fine courtesy and cooperation of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts had hearings on this privileged resolution. It appeared from the evidence of the witnesses representing the War Department that they are working day and night in their efforts to forward this program just as rapidly as possible. In addition, Mr. Speaker, we were told by the witnesses that if this resolution should be adopted they would be required to do that which is utterly impossible, because if they made weekly reports they would have to get reports from some 10,000 industries scattered throughout the length and breadth of the country. Perhaps the information would not be available each week because of the enormity of the program.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the floor leader.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say also that the very people who are trying to carry out this program of defense as fast as is humanly possible would have to sacrifice a great deal of time to get this information at such short periods as weekly intervals.

Mr. MAY. The evidence adduced before our committee, I may say to the distinguished gentleman from Texas, showed that they could not possibly do it without greatly interfering with the program.

Mr. RAYBURN. Further than that, I believe on last Thursday the country was given a complete synopsis of the general program and the progress made by the National Defense Committee.

Mr. MAY. That is correct.

Mr. RAYBURN. That brings us up to exactly now on it. Should the officers of the War and Navy Departments be called upon each week to furnish these reports they would have to devote 2 or 3 days each week to the task merely to appease somebody's curiosity. Time is all-important in furthering the program. To make these weekly reports might be a matter that would delay the program more than any one thing that could be done. Is not that the opinion of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MAY. From the hearings we have had and the information that is available in the records of the House Military Affairs Committee, it would greatly retard the progress of the program.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I appreciate very much the courtesy of the gentleman and the members of his committee in giving me a hearing. There was a lot more behind the resolution, however, than mere idle curiosity. The people want to know what is being done in the building up of national defense. We know what happened in Europe; we know what has happened to almost every country in Europe because they were unprepared.

We know what today is probably happening to England. People are more interested in our national defense than in anything else today and I feel that it is our duty and our grave responsibility as Members of Congress, who will be held to strict accountability, to secure this information for them. The heads of the President's Advisory Committee for National Defense, Mr. Knudsen and Mr. Stettinius, are great business executives and as such I am sure can easily send the Congress weekly reports upon their progress in defense.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentlewoman will pardon me for interrupting her and in answer to her question, may I say that the statement she has made is the very thing that prompted the House Military Affairs Committee to take this action, in order that we may not in any way interfere with the program that has been made absolutely necessary by that which is going on in Europe, in the Far East, and even in the southern part of the Western Hemisphere, in almost the entire world, as a matter of fact, or at least two-thirds of it.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. May I inquire of the gentleman if there is any disposition on the part of his committee or on the part of anybody, so far as he knows, to restore to the Congress some modicum of the power of control which the Congress has heretofore given away? In other words, in the mind of the gentleman, should the Congress not exercise some element of control in the building of this war machine?

Mr. MAY. I am very glad the gentleman asked that question, and I am happy to say to him that the House Military Affairs Committee is giving full consideration to all of the questions involved in these matters. Both the Senate bill on the National Guard and the Burke-Wadsworth selective service training bill are now in the committee.

Mr. COX. What is the promise of favorable results?

Mr. MAY. Just a moment. We have just completed rather extensive hearings this morning, having held them for a considerable length of time on both bills. We are continuing hearings over Wednesday. We hope to have the National Guard bill before the House on Wednesday. We are doing everything that we think the law and the Constitution will allow us to do, commensurate with the safety of this country and the vast powers that are given under the Constitution to the Commander in Chief in time of emergency.

Mr. Speaker, I move the resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Military Affairs Committee of the House may be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House for the remainder of the week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY]?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman one question? When the gentleman and the majority leader talked about a program in preparation for war, what war are you talking about?

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows that any reasonable interpretation would not permit of that thought.

Mr. MAY. We are not talking about preparation for war.

Mr. RAYBURN. No reasonable person would interpret anything I said to mean what the gentleman has said it did mean.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman from Kentucky just spoke about the program. What is this program? Your war program?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is a program for defense.

Mr. RICH. You are talking about a program for war.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am talking about a program of defense.

Mr. MAY. And peace, to keep this country out of war.

Mr. RICH. What is it that makes it necessary to have 2,000,000 men under arms and to spend $10,000,000,000 at a time like this when we are 3,000 miles away from Europe?

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is doing now the same thing he always does. He votes for things, then complains about their operation.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I take exception to that statement. I do not vote for things that way, and I will put my vote up against any New Deal Member on that side of the House or any other side of the House. I want to say here that all the gentleman does is get up here and try to criticize me. He knows my votes have been for economy and common sense. Watch the vote of your own brethren over there. I say you are preparing for war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and to include a couple of letters which I have.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I regret the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi believes there is any official Republican responsibility for collecting funds through this chain method. I say here and now, for the benefit not only of the Members of the House but the people of the country, that the Republican National Committee, or anyone who is officially running the Republican campaign, or Mr. Willkie, has not had anything to do with any letter advocating the raising of funds through the chain letter. We do not want people to contribute to or respond to that proposal. We cannot stop people from sending out chain letters or collecting money as far as I know. If Mr. Jackson or anyone else can do it, we would invite him to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. No; I do not yield.

[Here the gavel fell.]

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-three Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

TRANSPORTATION BILL OF 1940

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 2009) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the time for debate may be 1 hour and 20 minutes instead of 1 hour.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement on the part of the managers of the House may be read in lieu of the conference report.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to raise a point of order against the conference report. If the report is not to be read, as I understand, the point of order should be raised before the statement is read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can reserve the point of order at this juncture and make it later, after the statement is read.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then I reserve the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York is prepared to present his point of order, I believe it should be submitted now, because if the point of order is sustained a lot of time will be saved.

The SPEAKER. The point of order cannot be made until the conference report is read.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve the right to make a point of order against the conference report and two sections of the report, in addition to the reservation which has been made by the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia reserves the right to interpose points of order against the conference report.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California that the statement may be read in lieu of the report?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the statement may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

"'(b) It shall be unlawful for any common carrier by railroad or express company, subject to this part, to make or enter into any contract, agreement, or arrangement with any person for the furnishing to or on behalf of such carrier or express company of protective service against heat or cold to property transported or to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce, or for any such carier or express company to continue after April 1, 1941, as a party to any such contract, agreement, or arrangement unless and until such contract, agreement, or arrangement has been submitted to and approved by the Commission as just, reasonable, and consistent with the public interest: Provided, That if the Commission is unable to make its determination with respect to any such contract, agreement, or arrangement prior to said date, it may extend it to not later than October 1, 1941.'

"(b) Paragraph (17) of such section 1 (which relates to the duty of carriers by railroad, and their agents, to obey orders of the Commission relating to car service) is amended by inserting after '(17)' the letter '(a)'; and by adding after such paragraph (17) (a) the following new subparagraph:

It shall be unlawful for any person acting for or employed by any carrier by railroad subject to this part to solicit, accept, or receive, directly or indirectly, any money, property, or thing of value, or bribe in any other form whatsoever, with intent to be influenced thereby in his decision or action, or because of his decision or action, with respect to the supply, distribution, or movement of cars or other vehicles, or vessels, used in the transportation of property. Any person who violates the provisions of this subparagraph shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject for each offense to a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not more than two years, or both such fine and imprisonment.'

"(c) Paragraph (18) of such section 1 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: 'Nothing in this paragraph or in section 5 shall be considered to prohibit the making of contracts between carriers by railroad subject to this part, without the approval of the Commission, for the joint ownership or joint use of spur, industrial, team, switching, or side tracks.'"

"AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 3

"SEC. 5. (a) Paragraph (1) of section 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended (which prohibits the giving of undue or unreasonable preferences or advantages by carriers subject to part I), is amended to read as follows:

"'(1) It shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this part to make, give, or cause any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, association, locality, port, port district, gateway, transit point, region, district, territory, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever; or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, association, locality, port, port district, gateway, transit point, region, district, territory, or any particular description of traffic to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever: Provided, however, That this paragraph shall not be construed to apply to discrimination, prejudice, or disadvantage to the traffic of any other carrier of whatever description.

"'(1a) It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress that shippers of wheat, cotton, and all other farm commodities for export shall be granted export rates on the same principles as are applicable in the case of rates on industrial products for export. The Commission is hereby directed, on its own initiative or an application by interested persons, to make such investigations and conduct such hearings, and, after appropriate proceedings, to issue such orders, as may be necessary to carry out such policy.'

"(b) The Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized and directed to institute an investigation into the rates on manufactured products, agricultural commodities, and raw materials, between points in one classification territory and points in another such territory, and into like rates within any of such territories, maintained by common carriers by rail or water subject to part I of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, for the purpose of determining whether said rates are unjust and unreasonable or unlawful in any other respect in and of themselves or in their relation to each other, and to enter such orders as may be appropriate for the removal of any unlawfulness which may be found to exist: Provided, That the Commission in its discretion may confine its investigation to such manufactured products, agricultural commodities, and raw materials, and the rates thereon as shippers thereof may specifically request be included in such investigation.

"(c) Paragraph (2) of such section 3 (which requires payment of charges prior to delivery of freight, and prescribes certain rules of liability for payment of charges), is amended by adding at the end the following sentences: 'On shipments reconsigned or diverted by an agent who has furnished the carrier in the reconsignment or diversion order with a notice of agency and the proper name and address of the beneficial owner, and where such shipments are refused or abandoned at ultimate destination, the said beneficial owner shall be liable for all legally applicable charges in connection therewith. If the reconsignor or diverter has given to the carrier erroneous information as to who the beneficial owner is, such reconsignor or diverter shall himself be liable for all such charges, and an action for the enforcement of his liability may be begun within the same period provided in the case of an action against a consignee who has given erroneous information as to the beneficial owner.'

"(d) Such section 3 is amended by adding after paragraph (2) thereof the following new paragraph:

"'(3) If a shipper or consignor of a shipment of property (other than a prepaid shipment) is also the consignee named in the bill of lading and, prior to the time of delivery, notifies, in writing, a delivering carrier by railroad or a delivering express company subject to the provisions of this part, (a) to deliver such property at destination to another party, (b) that such party is the beneficial owner of such property, and (c) that delivery is to be made to such party only upon payment of all transportation charges in respect of the transportation of such property, and delivery is made by the carrier to such party without such payment, such shipper or consignor shall not be liable (as shipper, consignor, consignee, or otherwise) for such transportation charges but the party to whom delivery is so made shall in any event be liable for transportation charges billed against the property at the time of such delivery, and also for any additional charges which may be found to be due after delivery of the property, except that if such party prior to such delivery has notified in writing the delivering carrier that he is not the beneficial owner of the property, and has given in writing to such delivering carrier the name and address of such beneficial owner, such party shall not be liable for any additional charges which may be found to be due after delivery of the property; but if the party to whom delivery is made has given to the carrier erroneous information as to the beneficial owner, such party shall nevertheless be liable for such additional charges. If the shipper or consignor has given to the delivering carrier erroneous information as to who the beneficial owner is, such shipper or consignor shall himself be liable for such transportation charges, notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this paragraph and irrespective of any provisions to the contrary in the bill of lading or in the contract of transportation under which the shipment was made. An action for the enforcement of such liability either against the party to whom delivery is made or the shipper or consignor may be begun within the period provided in paragraph (3) of section 16, or before the expiration of six months after final judgment against the carrier in an action against either of such parties begun within the limitation period provided in paragraph (3) of section 16.

The term "delivering carrier" means the line-haul carrier making ultimate delivery.'

"(e) Paragraph (3) of such section 3 (which relates to the affording of facilities for interchange of traffic), is amended by striking out '(3)' and substituting in lieu thereof '(4)' and is further amended to read as follows:

"'(4) All carriers subject to the provisions of this part shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities for the interchange of traffic between their respective lines and connecting lines, and for the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of passengers or property to and from connecting lines; and shall not discriminate in their rates, fares, and charges between connecting lines, or unduly prejudice any connecting line in the distribution of traffic that is not specifically routed by the shipper. As used in this paragraph the term "connecting line" means the connecting line of any carrier subject to the provisions of this part or any common carrier by water subject to part III.'

"(f) Paragraph (4) of such section 3 (which relates to the Commission's power to require common use of terminals), is amended—

"(1) by striking out '(4)' and substituting in lieu thereof '(5)';

"(2) by striking out in the first sentence the words 'a carrier' and substituting in lieu thereof the words 'a common carrier by railroad';

"(3) by striking out in the first sentence the words 'any carrier, by another carrier or other carriers' and substituting in lieu thereof the words 'any common carrier by railroad, by another such carrier or other such carriers'; and

"(4) by adding after the words 'shall have power' in the first sentence the words 'by order'.

"LONG AND SHORT HAUL PROVISION

"SEC. 6. (a) Paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'(1) It shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to this part or part III to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers, or of like kind of property, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, or to charge any greater compensation as a through rate than the aggregate of the intermediate rates subject to the provisions of this part or part III, but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this part or part III to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, That upon application to the Commission such common carrier may in special cases, after investigation, be authorized by the Commission to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the Commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section, but in exercising the authority conferred upon it in this proviso the Commission shall not permit the establishment of any charge to or from the more distant point that is not reasonably compensatory for the service performed; and no such authorization shall be granted on account of merely potential water competition not actually in existence: And provided further, That tariffs proposing rates subject to the provisions of this paragraph may be filed when application is made to the Commission under the provisions hereof, and in the event such application is approved, the Commission shall permit such tariffs to become effective upon one day's notice.'

"(b) In the case of a carrier heretofore subject to the provisions of paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, no rate, fare, or charge lawfully in effect at the time of the enactment of this Act shall be required to be changed by reason of the amendments made to such paragraph by subsection (a) of this section. In the case of a carrier not heretofore subject to the provisions of such paragraph, no rate, fare, or charge lawfully in effect at the time of the enactment of this Act shall be required to be changed, by reason of the provisions of such paragraph, as amended by subsection (a) of this section, prior to six months after the enactment of this Act, or in case application for the continuance of any such existing rate, fare, or charge is filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission within such six months period, until the Commission has acted upon such application.

"POOLING; UNIFICATIONS, MERGERS, AND ACQUISITIONS OF CONTROL

"SEC. 7. Section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 5. (1) Except upon specific approval by order of the Commission as in this section provided, and except as provided in paragraph (16) of section 1 of this part, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to this part, part II, or part III to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination with any other such common carrier or carriers for the pooling or division of traffic, or of service, or of gross or net earnings, or of any portion thereof; and in any case of an unlawful agreement for the pooling or division of traffic, service, or earnings as aforesaid each day of its continuance shall be a separate offense: Provided, That whenever the Commission is of opinion, after hearing upon application of any such carrier or carriers or upon its own initiative, that the pooling or division, to the extent indicated by the Commission, of their traffic, service, or gross or net earnings, or of any portion thereof, will be in the interest of better service to the public or of economy in operation, and will not unduly restrain competition, the Commission shall by order approve and authorize, if assented to by all the carriers involved, such pooling or division, under such rules and regulations, and for such consideration as between such carriers and upon such terms and conditions, as shall be found by the Commission to be just and reasonable in the premises: Provided further, That any contract, agreement, or combination to which any common carrier by water subject to part III is a party, relating to the pooling or division of traffic, service, or earnings, or any portion thereof, lawfully existing on the date this paragraph as amended takes effect, if filed with the Commission within six months after such date, shall continue to be lawful except to the extent that the Commission, after hearing upon application or upon its own initiative, may find and by order declare that such contract, agreement, or combination is not in the interest of better service to the public or of economy in operation, or that it will unduly restrain competition.

"'(2) (a) It shall be lawful, with the approval and authorization of the Commission, as provided in subdivision (b)—

"'(i) for two or more carriers to consolidate or merge their properties or franchises, or any part thereof, into one corporation for the ownership, management, and operation of the properties theretofore in separate ownership; or for any carrier, or two or more carriers jointly, to purchase, lease, or contract to operate the properties, or any part thereof, of another; or for any carrier, or two or more carriers jointly, to acquire control of another through ownership of its stock or otherwise; or for a person which is not a carrier to acquire control of two or more carriers through ownership of their stock or otherwise; or for a person which is not a carrier and which has control of one or more carriers to acquire control of another carrier through ownership of its stock or otherwise; or

"'(ii) for a carrier by railroad to acquire trackage rights over, or joint ownership in or joint use of, any railroad line or lines owned or operated by any other such carrier, and terminals incidental thereto.

"'(b) Whenever a transaction is proposed under subparagraph (a), the carrier or carriers or person seeking authority therefor shall present an application to the Commission, and thereupon the Commission shall notify the Governor of each State in which any part of the properties of the carriers involved in the proposed transaction is situated, and also such carriers and the applicant or applicants (and, in case carriers by motor vehicle are involved, the persons specified in section 205 (e)), and shall afford reasonable opportunity for interested parties to be heard. If the Commission shall consider it necessary in order to determine whether the findings specified below may properly be made, it shall set said application for public hearing, and a public hearing shall be held in all cases where carriers by railroad are involved. If the Commission finds that, subject to such terms and conditions and such modifications as it shall find to be just and reasonable, the proposed transaction is within the scope of subparagraph (a) and will be consistent with the public interest, it shall enter an order approving and authorizing such transaction, upon the terms and conditions, and with the modifications, so found to be just and reasonable: Provided, That if a carrier by railroad subject to this part, or any person which is controlled by such a carrier, or affiliated therewith within the meaning of paragraph (6), is an applicant in the case of any such proposed transaction involving a motor carrier, the Commission shall not enter such an order unless it finds that the transaction proposed will be consistent with the public interest and will enable such carrier to use service by motor vehicle to public advantage in its operations and will not unduly restrain competition.

"'(c) In passing upon any proposed transaction under the provisions of this paragraph (2), the Commission shall give weight to the following considerations, among others: (1) The effect of the proposed transaction upon adequate transportation service to the public; (2) the effect upon the public interest of the inclusion, or failure to include, other railroads in the territory involved in the proposed transaction; (3) the total fixed charges resulting from the proposed transaction; and (4) the interest of the carrier employees affected.

"'(d) The Commission shall have authority in the case of a proposed transaction under this paragraph (2) involving a railroad or railroads, as a prerequiste to its approval of the proposed transaction, to require, upon equitable terms, the inclusion of another railroad or other railroads in the territory involved, upon petition by such railroad or railroads requesting such inclusion, and upon a finding that such inclusion is consistent with the public interest.

"'(e) No transaction which contemplates a guaranty or assumption of payment of dividends or of fixed charges, shall be approved by the Commission under this paragraph (2) except upon a specific finding by the Commission that such guaranty or assumption is not inconsistent with the public interest. No transaction shall be approved under this paragraph (2) which will result in an increase of total fixed charges, except upon a specific finding by the Commission that such increase would not be contrary to public interest.

"'(f) As a condition of its approval, under this paragraph (2), of any transaction involving a carrier or carriers by railroad subject to the provisions of this part, the Commission shall require a fair and equitable arrangement to protect the interests of the railroad employees affected. In its order of approval the Commission shall include terms and conditions providing that during the period of four years from the effective date of such order such transaction will not result in employees of the carrier or carriers by railroad affected by such order being in a worse position with respect to their employment, except that the protection afforded to any employee pursuant to this sentence shall not be required to continue for a longer period, following the effective date of such order than the period during which employee was in the employ of such carrier or carriers prior to the effective date of such order. Notwithstanding any other provisions of this Act, an agreement pertaining to the protection of the interests of said employees may hereafter be entered into by any carrier or carriers by railroad and the duly authorized representative or representatives of its or their employees.

"'(3) Whenever a person which is not a carrier is authorized, by an order entered under paragraph (2), to acquire control of any carrier or of two or more carriers, such person thereafter shall, to the extent provided by the Commission in such order, be considered as a carrier subject to such of the following provisions as are applicable to any carrier involved in such acquisition of control: Section 20 (1) to (10), inclusive, of this part, sections 204 (a) (1) and (2) and 220 of part II, and section 313 of part III, (which relate to reports, accounts, and so forth, of carriers), and section 20a (2) to (11), inclusive, of this part, and section 214 of part II, (which relate to issues of securities and assumptions of liability of carriers), including in each case the penalties applicable in the case of violations of such provisions. In the application of such provisions of section 20a of this part and of section 214 of part II, in the case of any such person, the Commission shall authorize the issue or assumption applied for only if it finds that such issue or assumption is consistent with the proper performance of its service to the public by each carrier which is under the control of such person, that it will not impair the ability of any such carrier to perform such service, and that it is otherwise consistent with the public interest.

"'(4) It shall be unlawful for any person, except as provided in paragraph (2), to enter into any transaction within the scope of subparagraph (a) thereof, or to accomplish or effectuate, or to participate in accomplishing or effectuating, the control or management in a common interest of any two or more carriers, however such result is attained, whether directly or indirectly, by use of common directors, officers, or stockholders, a holding or investment company or companies, a voting trust or trusts, or in any other manner whatsoever. It shall be unlawful to continue to maintain control or management accomplished or effectuated after the enactment of this amendatory paragraph and in violation of its provisions. As used in this paragraph and paragraph (5), the words "control or management" shall be construed to include the power to exercise control or management.

"'(5) For the purposes of this section, but not in anywise limiting the application of the provisions thereof, any transaction shall be deemed to accomplish or effectuate the control or management in a common interest of two carriers—

"'(a) if such transaction is by a carrier, and if the effect of such transaction is to place such carrier and persons affiliated with it, taken together, in control of another carrier;

"'(b) if such transaction is by a person affiliated with a carrier, and if the effect of such transaction is to place such carrier and persons affiliated with it, taken together, in control of another carrier;

"'(c) if such transaction is by two or more persons acting together, one of whom is a carrier or is affiliated with a carrier, and if the effect of such transaction is to place such persons and carriers and persons affiliated with any one of them and persons affiliated with any such affiliated carrier, taken together, in control of another carrier.

"'(6) For the purposes of this section a person shall be held to be affiliated with a carrier if, by reason of the relationship of such person to such carrier (whether by reason of the method of, or circumstances surrounding organization or operation, or whether established through common directors, officers, or stockholders, a voting trust or trusts, a holding or investment company or companies, or any other direct or indirect means), it is reasonable to believe that the affairs of any carrier of which control may be acquired by such person will be managed in the interest of such other carrier.

"'(7) The Commissioner is hereby authorized, upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, but after notice and hearing, to investigate and determine whether any person is violating the provisions of paragraph (4). If the Commission finds after such investigation that such person is violating the provisions of such paragraph, it shall by order require such person to take such action as may be necessary, in the opinion of the Commission, to prevent continuance of such violation. The provisions of this paragraph shall be in addition to, and not in substitution for, any other enforcement provisions contained in this part; and with respect to any violation of paragraphs (2) to (12), inclusive, of this section, any penalty provision applying to such a violation by a common carrier subject to this part shall apply to such a violation by any other person.

"'(8) The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction upon the complaint of the Commission, alleging a violation of any of the provisions of this section or disobedience of any order issued by the Commission thereunder by any person, to issue such writs of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, as may be necessary to restrain such person from violation of such provision or to compel obedience to such order.

"'(9) The Commission may from time to time, for good cause shown, make such orders, supplemental to any order made under paragraph (1), (2), or (7), as it may deem necesssary or appropriate.

"'(10) Nothing in this section shall be construed to require the approval or authorization of the Commission in the case of a transaction within the scope of paragraph (2) where the only parties to the transaction are motor carriers subject to part II (but not including a motor carrier controlled by or affiliated with a carrier as defined in section 1 (3)), and where the aggregate number of motor vehicles owned, leased, controlled, or operated by such parties, for purposes of transportation subject to part II, does not exceed twenty.

"'(11) The authority conferred by this section shall be exclusive and plenary, and any carrier or corporation participating in or resulting from any transaction approved by the Commission thereunder, shall have full power (with the assent, in the case of a purchase and sale, a lease, a corporate consolidation, or a corporate merger, of a majority, unless a different vote is required under applicable State law, in which case the number so required shall assent, of the votes of the holders of the shares entitled to vote of the capital stock of such corporation at a regular meeting of such stockholders, the notice of such meeting to include such purpose, or at a special meeting thereof called for such purpose) to carry such transaction into effect and to own and operate any properties and exercise any control or franchises acquired through said transaction without invoking any approval under State authority; and any carriers or other corporations, and their officers and employees and any other persons, participating in a transaction approved or authorized under the provisions of this section shall be and they are hereby relieved from the operation of the antitrust laws and of all other restraints, limitations, and prohibitions of law, Federal, State, or municipal, insofar as may be necessary to enable them to carry into effect the transaction so approved or provided for in accordance with the terms and conditions, if any, imposed by the Commission, and to hold, maintain, and operate any properties and exercise any control or franchises acquired through such transaction. Nothing in this section shall be construed to create or provide for the creation, directly or indirectly, of a Federal corporation, but any power granted by this section to any carrier or other corporation shall be deemed to be in addition to and in modification of its powers under its corporate charter or under the laws of any State.

"'(12) If any provision of the foregoing paragraphs of this section, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the other provisions of such paragraphs, and the application of such provision to any other person or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

"'(13) As used in paragraphs (2) to (12), inclusive, the term "carrier" means a carrier by railroad and an express company, subject to this part; a motor carrier subject to part II; and a water carrier subject to part III.

"'(14) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (2), from and after the 1st day of July 1914, it shall be unlawful for any carrier, as defined in section 1 (3), or (after the date of the enactment of this amendatory section) any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with, such a carrier to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water operated through the Panama Canal or elsewhere with which such carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic or any vessel carrying freight or passengers upon said water route or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense.

"'(15) Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Commission to determine questions of fact, arising under paragraph (14), as to the competition or possibility of competition, after full hearing, on the application of any railroad company or other carrier. Such application may be filed for the purpose of determining whether any existing service is in violation of such paragraph and may pray for an order permitting the continuance of any vessel or vessels already in operation, or may pray for an order under the provisions of paragraph (16). The Commission may on its own motion or the application of any shipper institute proceedings to inquire into the operation of any vessel in use by any railroad or other carrier which has not applied to the Commission and had the question of competition or the possibility of competition determined as herein provided. In all such cases the order of said Commission shall be final.

"'(16) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (14), the Commission shall have authority, upon application of any carrier, as defined in section 1 (3), and after hearing, by order to authorize such carrier to own or acquire ownership of, to lease or operate, to have or acquire control of, or to have or acquire an interest in, a common carrier by water or vessel, not operated through the Panama Canal, with which the applicant does or may compete for traffic, if the Commission shall find that the continuance or acquisition of such ownership, lease, operation, control, or interest will not prevent such common carrier by water or vessel from being operated in the interest of the public and with advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people, and that it will not exclude, prevent, or reduce competition on the route by water under consideration: Provided, That if the transaction or interest sought to be entered into, continued, or acquired is within the scope of paragraph (2) (a), the provisions of paragraph (2) shall be applicable thereto in addition to the provisions of this paragraph: And provided further, That no such authorization shall be necessary if the carrier having the ownership, lease, operation, control, or interest has, prior to the date this section as amended becomes effective, obtained an order of extension under the provisions of paragraph (21) of this section, as in effect prior to such date, and such order is still in effect.'

"(c) Paragraph (13) of such section (which relates to the jurisdiction of the Commission as to through routes, joint rates, and other matters in connection with certain combination rail and water transportation), is further amended—

"(d) Such section 6 is further amended by inserting at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"'(12) If any common carrier subject to this Act enters into arrangements with any water carrier operating from a port in the United States to a foreign country, through the Panama Canal or otherwise, for the handling of through business between interior points of the United States and such foreign country, the Commission may by order require such common carrier to enter into similar arrangements with any or all other lines of steamships operating from said port to the same foreign country.'

"AMENDMENTS TO SECTIONS 12 AND 13

"SEC. 9. (a) The provisions of paragraph (1) of section 12 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, down to and including the second semicolon therein, are amended to read as follows:

"'(1) The Commission shall have authority, in order to perform the duties and carry out the objects for which it was created, to inquire into and report on the management of the business of all common carriers subject to the provisions of this part, and to inquire into and report on the management of the business of persons controlling, controlled by, or under a common control with, such carriers, to the extent that the business of such persons is related to the management of the business of one or more such carriers, and the Commission shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same are conducted. The Commission may obtain from such carriers and persons such information as the Commission deems necessary to carry out the provisions of this part; and may transmit to Congress from time to time such recommendations (including recommendations as to additional legislation) as the Commission may deem necessary. The Commission is hereby authorized and required to execute and enforce the provisions of this part;'.

"(b) Paragraph (2) of section 13 of such Act, as amended (which relates to investigations by the Commission upon complaint or upon its own motion), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence: 'Representatives of State commissions sitting with the Commission, under the provisions of this section, in cases pending before the Commission, shall receive such allowances for travel and subsistence expense as the Commission shall provide.'

"(c) The last two sentences of paragraph (3) of such section 13 (which relates to the authority of the Commission to confer and cooperate with State authorities in certain cases) are amended by striking out the words 'this part' where they appear therein and inserting in lieu thereof 'this part or part III'.

"AMENDMENTS TO SECTIONS 15 AND 15A

"(b) Paragraphs (3) and (4) of such section 15 (which relate to the Commission's authority to establish through routes and joint rates, fares, and charges, and divisions of such rates, fares, and charges; and which impose certain limitations on the Commission's power to prescribe through routes) are amended to read as follows:

"'(3) The Commission may, and it shall whenever deemed by it to be necessary or desirable in the public interest, after full hearing upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, establish through routes, joint classifications, and joint rates, fares, or charges, applicable to the transportation of passengers or property by carriers subject to this part, or by carriers by railroad subject to this part and common carriers by water subject to part III, or the maxima or minima, or maxima and minima, to be charged, and the divisions of such rates, fares, or charges as hereinafter provided, and the terms and conditions under which such through routes shall be operated. The Commission shall not, however, establish any through route, classification, or practice, or any rate, fare, or charge, between street electric passenger railways not engaged in the general business of transporting freight in addition to their passenger and express business, and railroads of a different character. If any tariff or schedule canceling any through route or joint rate, fare, charge, or classification, without the consent of all carriers parties thereto or authorization by the Commission, is suspended by the Commission for investigation, the burden of proof shall be upon the carrier or carriers proposing such cancelation to show that it is consistent with the public interest, without regard to the provisions of paragraph (4) of this section.

"'(4) In establishing any such through route the Commission shall not (except as provided in section 3, and except where one of the carriers is a water line) require any carrier by railroad, without its consent, to embrace in such route substantially less than the entire length of its railroad and of any intermediate railroad operated in conjunction and under a common management or control therewith, which lies between the termini of such proposed through route, (a) unless such inclusion of lines would make the through route unreasonably long as compared with another practicable through route which could otherwise be established, or (b) unless the Commission finds that the through route proposed to be established is needed in order to provide adequate, and more efficient or more economic, transportation: Provided, however, That in prescribing through routes the Commission shall, so far as is consistent with the public interest, and subject to the foregoing limitations in clauses (a) and (b), give reasonable preference to the carrier by railroad which originates the traffic. No through route and joint rates applicable thereto shall be established by the Commission for the purpose of assisting any carrier that would participate therein to meet its financial needs. In time of shortage of equipment, congestion of traffic, or other emergency declared by the Commission, it may (either upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, at once, if it so orders, without answer or other formal pleadings by the interested carrier or carriers, and with or without notice, hearing, or the making or filing of a report, according as the Commission may determine) establish temporarily such through routes as in its opinion are necessary or desirable in the public interest.'

"(c) The last sentence of paragraph (7) of such section 15 is amended to read as follows:

"'At any hearing involving a change in a rate, fare, charge, or classification, or in a rule, regulation, or practice, after the date this amendatory provision takes effect, the burden of proof shall be upon the carrier to show that the proposed changed rate, fare, charge, classification, rule, regulation, or practice is just and reasonable, and the Commission shall give to the hearing and decision of such questions preference over all other questions pending before it and decide the same as speedily as possible.'

"(d) Paragraph (13) of such section 15 (which relates to allowances to owners of property for services rendered to carriers in connection with transportation) is amended by inserting after 'the charge and allowance therefor shall be', the following: 'published in tariffs or schedules filed in the manner provided in this part and shall be'.

"(e) Paragraph (2) of section 15a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended (which contains the rule of rate making for part I), is amended to read as follows:

"'(2) In the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates the Commission shall give due consideration, among other factors, to the effect of rates on the movement of traffic by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed; to the need, in the public interest, of adequate and efficient railway transportation service at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service; and to the need of revenues sufficient to enable the carriers, under honest, economical, and efficient management, to provide such service.'

"AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 16

"SEC. 11. (a) Section 16 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended (which relates to orders of the Commission and enforcement thereof), is amended—

"(1) by striking out in paragraph (2) thereof the word 'circuit' before 'court' wherever it appears and substituting in lieu thereof the word 'district'; by striking out the word 'petition' in the first sentence and substituting in lieu thereof the word 'complaint'; by striking out the word 'petitioner' in the second and third sentences and substituting in lieu thereof the word 'plaintiff';

"(2) by striking out in paragraph (3) (a) thereof the words 'three years' and substituting in lieu thereof the words 'two years';

"(3) by striking out in paragraph (3) (c) thereof the words 'three years' and substituting in lieu thereof the words 'two years', and by striking out the word 'three-year' and substituting in lieu thereof the word 'two-year';

"(4) by striking out in paragraph (3) (d) thereof the word 'three-year' and substituting in lieu thereof the word 'two-year';

"(5) by striking out in paragraph (3) (f) thereof the word 'petition' and substituting in lieu thereof the word 'complaint'; and

"(6) by striking out in paragraph (12) thereof the words 'the Commerce Court' and substituting in lieu thereof the words 'any district court of the United States of competent jurisdiction' and by striking out the words 'that Court' and the words 'the Court' in the second sentence and substituting in lieu thereof the words 'such court'.

"(b) Paragraph (5) of such section 16 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: 'In proceedings before the Commission involving the lawfulness of rates, fares, charges, classifications, or practices, service of notice upon an attorney in fact of a carrier who has filed a tariff or schedule in behalf of such carrier shall be deemed to be due and sufficient service upon the carrier, except where the carrier has designated an agent in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, upon whom service of notices and processes may be made, as provided in section 6 of the Act of June 18, 1910 (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 49, sec. 50).'

"(c) The amendments made by subsection (a) of this section to paragraph (3) (a) and (c) of section 16 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, shall apply only in the case of causes of action accruing after the date this section takes effect.

"COMMISSION PROCEDURE; DELEGATION OF DUTIES; REHEARINGS

"SEC. 12. Section 16a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, is hereby repealed, and section 17 of such Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 17. (1) The Commission is hereby authorized by its order to divide the members thereof into as many divisions (each to consist of not less than three members) as it may deem necessary, which may be changed from time to time. Such divisions shall be designated, respectively, division one, division two, and so forth, or by a term descriptive of the principal subject, work, business, or function assigned or referred to such divisions. The Commission may designate one or more of its divisions as appellate divisions. Any Commissioner may be assigned to such division or divisions as the Commission may direct, and the senior in service of the Commissioners constituting a division shall act as chairman thereof unless otherwise directed by the Commission. When a vacancy occurs in any division or when a Commissioner because of absence, or other cause, is unable to serve thereon, the Chairman of the Commission or any Commissioner designated by him for that purpose may serve temporarily on such division until the Commission otherwise orders.

"'(2) The Commission may by order direct that any of its work, business, or functions under any provision of law (except matters required to be referred to joint boards by section 205, and except functions vested in the Commission under this section), or any matter which shall have been or may be referred to it by Congress or by either branch thereof, be assigned or referred to any division, to an individual Commissioner, or to a board to be composed of three or more eligible employees of the Commission (hereinafter in this section called a "board") to be designated by such order, for action thereon, and the Commission may by order at any time amend, modify, supplement, or rescind any such assignment or reference. The following classes of employees shall be eligible for designation by the Commission to serve on such boards: examiners, directors or assistant directors of bureaus, chiefs of sections, and attorneys. The assignment or reference, to divisions, of work, business, or functions relating to the lawfulness of rates, fares, or charges shall be made according to the character of regulation to be exercised and not according to the kind or class of the carriers involved or to the form or mode of transportation in which such carriers may be engaged. When an individual Commissioner, or any employee, is unable to act upon any matter so assigned or referred because of absence or other cause, the Chairman of the Commission may designate another Commissioner or employee, as the case may be, to serve temporarily until the Commission otherwise orders.

"'(3) The Commission shall conduct its proceedings under any provision of law in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and to the ends of justice. The Commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. Any member of the Commission, the Secretary of the Commission, or any member of a board may administer oaths and affirmations and any member of the Commission or the Secretary of the Commission (or any member of a board in connection with the performance of any work, business, or functions referred under this section to a board upon which he serves) may sign subpenas. A majority of the Commission, of a division, or of a board shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. The Commission may, from time to time, make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, or before any division, individual Commissioner, or board, including forms of notices and the service thereof, which shall conform, as nearly as may be, to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear before the Commission or any division, individual Commissioner, or board and be heard in person or by attorney. Every vote and official act of the Commission, or of any division, individual Commissioner, or board, shall be entered of record, and such record shall be made public upon the request of any party interested. All hearings before the Commission, a division, individual Commissioner, or board shall be public upon the request of any party interested. No Commissioner or employee shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he shall have any pecuniary interest.

"'(4) A division, an individual Commissioner, or a board shall have authority to hear and determine, order, certify, report, or otherwise act as to any work, business, or functions assigned or referred thereto under the provisions of this section, and with respect thereto shall have all the jurisdiction and powers conferred by law upon the Commission, and be subject to the same duties and obligations. The secretary and seal of the Commission shall be the secretary and seal of each division, individual Commissioner, or board. Except as otherwise provided in this section, any order, decision, or requirement of a division, an individual Commissioner, or a board, with respect to any matter so assigned or referred, shall have the same force and effect, and may be made and evidenced in the same manner as if made or taken by the Commission.

"'(5) Any finding, report, or requirement of an individual Commissioner or board, with respect to any matter so assigned or referred involving the taking of testimony at a public hearing, shall be accompanied by a statement in writing of the reasons therefor, together with a recommended order, which shall be filed with the Commission. Copies thereof shall be served upon interested parties (including, in proceedings under part II, persons specified in section 205 (e)), who may file exceptions thereto, but if within twenty days after service upon such persons, or within such further period as the Commission or a duly designated division thereof may authorize, no exceptions shall have been filed, such recommended order shall become the order of the Commission and become effective unless within such period the order shall have been stayed or postponed by the Commission or by a duly designated division thereof. The Commission, or a duly designated division thereof, upon its own motion may, and where exceptions are filed it shall, reconsider the matter either upon the same record or after further hearing, and such recommended order shall thereupon be stayed or postponed pending final determination thereof.

"'(6) After a decision, order, or requirement shall have been made by the Commission, a division, an individual Commissioner, or a board, or after an order recommended by an individual Commissioner or a board shall have become the order of the Commission as provided in paragraph (5), any party thereto may at any time, subject to such limitations as may be established by the Commission as hereinafter authorized, make application for rehearing, reargument, or reconsideration of the same, or of any matter determined therein. Such applications shall be governed by such general rules as the Commission may establish. Any such application, if the decision, order, or requirement was made by the Commission, shall be considered and acted upon by the Commission. If the decision, order, or requirement was made by a division, an individual Commissioner, or a board, such application shall be considered and acted upon by the Commission or referred to an appropriate appellate division for consideration and action. Rehearing, reargument, or reconsideration may be granted if sufficient reason therefor be made to appear; but the Commission may, from time to time, make or amend general rules or orders establishing limitations upon the right to apply for rehearing, reargument, or reconsideration of a decision, order, or requirement of the Commission or of a division so as to confine such right to proceedings, or classes of proceedings, involving issues of general transportation importance. Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this paragraph, any application for rehearing, reargument, or reconsideration of a matter assigned or referred to an individual Commissioner or a board, under the provisions of paragraph (2), if such application shall have been filed within twenty days after the recommended order in the proceeding shall have become the order of the Commission as provided in paragraph (5), and if such matter shall not have been reconsidered or reheard as provided in such paragraph, shall be referred to an appropriate appellate division of the Commission and such division shall reconsider the matter either upon the same record or after a further hearing.

"'(7) If after rehearing, reargument, or reconsideration of a decision, order, or requirement of a division, an individual Commissioner, or board it shall appear that the original decision, order, or requrement is in any respect unjust or unwarranted, the Commission or appellate division may reverse, change, or modify the same accordingly. Any decision, order, or requirement made after rehearing, reargument, or reconsideration, reversing, changing, or modifying the original determination shall be subject to the same provisions with respect to rehearing, reargument, or reconsideration as an original order.

"'(8) Where application for rehearing, reargument, or reconsideration of a decision, order, or requirement of a division, an individual Commissioner, or board is made in accordance with the provisions of this section and the rules and regulations of the Commission, and the decision, order, or requirement has not yet become effective, the decision, order, or requirement shall be stayed or postponed pending disposition of the matter by the Commission or appellate division; but otherwise the making of such an application shall not excuse any person from complying with or obeying the decision, order, or requirement, or operate to stay or postpone the enforcement thereof, without the special order of the Commission.

"'(9) When an application for rehearing, reargument, or reconsideration of any decision, order, or requirement of a division, an individual Commissioner, or a board with respect to any matter assigned or referred to him or it shall have been made and shall have been denied, or after rehearing, reargument, or reconsideration otherwise disposed of, by the Commission or an appellate division, a suit to enforce, enjoin, suspend, or set aside such decision, order, or requirement, in whole or in part, may be brought in a court of the United States under those provisions of law applicable in the case of suits to enforce, enjoin, suspend, or set aside orders of the Commission, but not otherwise.

"'(10) Any matter arising in the administration of part II of this Act as to which a hearing is to be held may be referred to an examiner of the Commission, for action thereon, subject to the conditions and limitations provided in this section in the case of reference of work, business or functions, as to which a hearing is to be held, to an individual Commissioner or board.

"'(11) Representatives of employees of a carrier, duly designated as such, may intervene and be heard in any proceeding arising under this Act affecting such employees.

"'(12) The Commission is authorized to promulgate reasonable rules and regulations relating to admission to practice before it, and is authorized to impose a reasonable fee for such admission, and such fees shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.'

"AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 20

"'SEC. 20. (1) The Commission is hereby authorized to require annual, periodical, or special reports from carriers (as defined in this section) and from lessors (as defined in this section), to prescribe the manner and form in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers and lessors specific and full, true, and correct answers to all questions upon which the Commission may deem information to be necessary, classifying such carriers and lessors as it may deem proper for any of these purposes. Such annual reports shall give an account of the affairs of the carrier or lessor in such form and detail as may be prescribed by the Commission.

"'(2) Said annual reports shall contain all the required information for the period of 12 months ending on the 31st day of December in each year, unless the Commission shall specify a different date, and shall be made out under oath and filed with the Commission at its office in Washington within 3 months after the close of the year for which the report is made, unless additional time be granted in any case by the Commission. Such periodical or special reports as may be required by the Commission under paragraph (1) hereof, shall also be under oath whenever the Commission so requires.

"'(3) The Commission may, in its discretion, for the purpose of enabling it the better to carry out the purposes of this part, prescribe a uniform system of accounts applicable to any class of carriers subject thereto, and a period of time within which such class shall have such uniform system of accounts, and the manner in which such accounts shall be kept.

"'(4) The Commission shall, as soon as practicable, prescribe for carriers the classes of property for which depreciation charges may properly be included under operating expenses, and the rate or rates of depreciation which shall be charged with respect to each of such classes of property, classifying the carriers as it may deem proper for this purpose. The Commission may, when it deems necessary, modify the classes and rates so prescribed. When the Commission shall have exercised its authority under the foregoing provisions of this paragraph, carriers shall not charge to operating expenses any depreciation charges on classes of property other than those prescribed by the Commission, or charge with respect to any class of property a rate of depreciation other than that prescribed therefor by the Commission, and no such carrier shall include under operating expenses any depreciation charge in any form whatsoever other than as prescribed by the Commission.

"'(5) The Commission may, in its discretion, prescribe the forms of any and all accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by carriers and their lessors, including the accounts, records, and memoranda of the movement of traffic, as well as of the receipts and expenditures of moneys, and it shall be unlawful for such carriers or lessors to keep any accounts, records, and memoranda contrary to any rules, regulations, or orders of the Commission with respect thereto. The Commission or any duly authorized special agent, accountant, or examiner thereof shall at all times have authority to inspect and copy any and all accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents, of such carriers and lessors, and such accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents, of any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with any such carrier, as the Commission deems relevant to such person's relation to or transactions with such carrier. The Commission or its duly authorized special agents, accountants, or examiners shall at all times have access to all lands, buildings, or equipment of such carriers or lessors, and shall have authority under its order to inspect and examine any and all such lands, buildings, and equipment. Such carriers, lessors, and other persons shall submit their accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents for the inspection and copying authorized by this paragraph, and such carriers and lessors shall submit their lands, buildings, and equipment to inspection and examination, to any duly authorized special agent, accountant, or examiner of the Commission, upon demand and the display of proper credentials.

"'(6) The Commission or any duly authorized special agent, accountant, or examiner thereof shall at all times have authority to inspect and copy any and all accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents, of persons which furnish cars or protective service against heat or cold to or on behalf of any carrier by railroad or express company subject to this part: Provided, however, That such authority shall be limited to accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, or other documents which pertain or relate to the cars or protective service so furnished. The Commission shall further have authority, in its discretion, to prescribe the forms of any or all accounts, records, and memoranda which it is authorized by this paragraph to inspect and copy, and to require the persons furnishing such cars or protective service, as aforesaid, to submit such reports and specific and full, true, and correct answers to such questions, relative to such cars or service, as the Commission may deem necessary. Persons furnishing such cars or protective service shall submit their accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, or other documents, to the extent above provided, for inspection or copying to any duly authorized special agent, accountant, or examiner of the Commission upon demand and the display of proper credentials.

"'(7) (a) In case of failure or refusal on the part of any carrier, lessor, or other person to keep any accounts, records, and memoranda in the form and manner prescribed, under authority of this section, by the Commission, or to submit any accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, or other documents to the Commission or any of its authorized agents, accountants, or examiners for inspection or copying, as required under this section, such carrier, lessor, or person shall forfeit to the United States not to exceed $500 for each such offense and for each day during which such failure or refusal continues.

"'(b) Any person who shall knowingly and willfully make, cause to be made, or participate in the making of, any false entry in any annual or other report required under this section to be filed, or in the accounts of any book of accounts or in any records or memoranda kept by a carrier, or required under this section to be kept by a lessor or other person, or who shall knowingly and willfully destroy, mutilate, alter, or by any other means or device falsify the record of any such accounts, records, or memoranda, or who shall knowingly and willfully neglect or fail to make full, true, and correct entires in such accounts, records, or memoranda of all facts and transactions appertaining to the business of the carrier, lessor, or person, or shall knowingly and willfully keep any accounts, records, or memoranda contrary to the rules, regulations, or orders of the Commission with respect thereto, or shall knowingly or willfully file with the Commission any false report or other document, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction to a fine of not more than five thousand dollars or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That the Commission may in its discretion issue orders specifying such operating, accounting, or financial papers, records, books, blanks, tickets, stubs, correspondence, or documents of such carriers, lessors, or other persons as may, after a reasonable time, be destroyed, and prescribing the length of time the same shall be preserved.

"'(c) Any carrier or lessor, or person furnishing cars or protective service, or any officer, agent, employee, or representative thereof, who shall fail to make and file an annual or other report with the Commission within the time fixed by the Commission, or to make specific and full, true, and correct answer to any question within thirty days from the time it is lawfully required by the Commission so to do, shall forfeit to the United States the sum of one hundred dollars for each and every day it shall continue to be in default with respect thereto.

"'(d) In case of failure or refusal on the part of any carrier or lessor to accord to the Commission or its duly authorized special agents, accountants, or examiners, access to, and opportunity for the inspection and examination of, any lands, buildings, or equipment of said carrier or lessor, as provided in this section, such carrier or lessor shall forfeit to the United States the sum of one hundred dollars for each day during which such failure or refusal continues.

"EXEMPTION OF CERTAIN INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE OPERATIONS OF MOTOR CARRIERS

"SEC. 19. Subsection (a) of section 204 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, is amended by adding after subparagraph (4) thereof the following new subparagraph:

"'(4a) To determine, upon its own motion, or upon application by a motor carrier, a State board, or any other party in interest, whether the transportation in interstate or foreign commerce performed by any motor carrier or class of motor carriers lawfully engaged in operation solely within a single State is in fact of such nature, character, or quantity as not substantially to affect or impair uniform regulation by the Commission of transportation by motor carriers engaged in interstate or foreign commerce in effectuating the national transportation policy declared in this Act. Upon so finding, the Commission shall issue a certificate of exemption to such motor carrier or class of motor carriers which, during the period such certificate shall remain effective and unrevoked, shall exempt such carrier or class of motor carriers from compliance with the provisions of this part, and shall attach to such certificate such reasonable terms and conditions as the public interest may require. At any time after the issuance of any such certificate of exemption, the Commission may by order revoke all or any part thereof, if it shall find that the transportation in interstate or foreign commerce performed by the carrier or class of carriers designated in such certificate shall be, or shall have become, or is reasonably likely to become, of such nature, character, or quantity as in fact substantially to affect or impair uniform regulation by the Commission of interstate or foreign transportation by motor carriers in effectuating the national transportation policy declared in this Act. Upon revocation of any such certificate, the Commission shall restore to the carrier or carriers affected thereby, without further proceedings, the authority, if any, to operate in interstate or foreign commerce held by such carrier or carriers at the time the certificate of exemption pertaining to such carrier or carriers became effective. No certificate of exemption shall be denied, and no order of revocation shall be issued, under this subparagraph, except after reasonable opportunity for hearing to interested parties. Where an application is made in good faith for the exemption of a motor carrier under this subparagraph, accompanied by a certificate of a State board of the State in which the operations of such carrier are carried on stating that in the opinion of such board such carrier is entitled to a certificate of exemption under this subparagraph, such carrier shall be exempt from the provisions of this part beginning with the sixtieth day following the making of such application to the Commission unless prior to such time the Commission shall have by order denied such application, and such exemption shall be effective until such time as the Commission, after such sixtieth day, may by order deny such application or may by order revoke all or any part thereof as hereinbefore authorized. In any case where a motor carrier has become exempt from the provisions of this part as provided in this subparagraph, it shall not be considered to be a burden on interstate or foreign commerce for a State to regulate such carrier with respect to the operations covered by such exemption. Applications under this subparagraph shall be made in writing to the Commission, verified under oath, and shall be in such form and contain such information as the Commission shall by regulations require.'

It shall be unlawful for any common carrier by motor vehicle engaged in interstate or foreign commerce to make, give, or cause any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, port, gateway, locality, region, district, territory, or description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever; or to subject any particular person, port, gateway, locality, region, district, territory, or description of traffic to any unjust discrimination or any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever: Provided, however, That this subsection shall not be construed to apply to discriminations, prejudice, or disadvantage to the traffic of any other carrier of whatever description.'

"(c) Subsection (g) of such section 216 (which relates to investigations by the Commission as to lawfulness of proposed new rates involving common carriers by motor vehicle, and the suspension of such rates), is amended—

"(1) by inserting before the words 'suspend the operation of such schedule', in the first sentence thereof, the words 'from time to time';

"(2) by striking out in the first sentence thereof the words 'for a period of ninety days and if the proceeding has not been concluded and a final order made within such period the Commission may, from time to time, extend the period of suspension by order, but not for a longer period in the aggregate than one hundred and eighty days' and substituting in lieu thereof the words 'but not for a longer period than seven months';

"'(i) In the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates, fares, and charges for the transportation of passengers or property by common carriers by motor vehicle, and classifications, regulations, and practices relating thereto, the Commission shall give due consideration, among other factors, to the inherent advantages of transportation by such carriers; to the effect of rates upon the movement of traffic by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed; to the need, in the public interest, of adequate and efficient transportation service by such carriers at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service; and to the need of revenues sufficient to enable such carriers, under honest, economical, and efficient management, to provide such service.'

"(e) The proviso in subsection (b) of section 217 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, is amended by striking out '22 (1)' and inserting in lieu thereof '22'.

"AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 218

"SEC. 23. (a) Subsection (a) of section 218 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, is amended—

"(1) by striking out the first sentence thereof (which relates to the duty of contract carriers by motor vehicle to file schedules and contracts including minimum rates, etc.) and substituting in lieu thereof two new sentences as follows: 'It shall be the duty of every contract carrier by motor vehicle to establish and observe reasonable minimum rates and charges for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property or in connection therewith, and to establish and observe reasonable regulations and practices to be applied in connection with said reasonable minimum rates, fares, and charges. It shall be the duty of every contract carrier by motor vehicle to file with the Commission, publish, and keep open for public inspection, in the form and manner prescribed by the Commission, schedules containing the minimum rates or charges of such carrier actually maintained and charged for the transportation of passengers or property in interstate or foreign commerce, and any rule, regulation, or practice affecting such rates or charges and the value of the service thereunder.'

"(2) By striking out, in the third sentence thereof, the words 'or copies of contracts.'

"(b) Subsection (b) of such section 218 (which relates to the Commission's authority to prescribe minimum charges of contract carriers by motor vehicle), is amended to read as follows:

"'(b) Whenever, after hearing, upon complaint or upon its own initiative, the Commission finds that any minimum rate or charge of any contract carrier by motor vehicle, or any rule, regulation, or practice of any such carrier affecting such minimum rate or charge, or the value of the service thereunder, for the transportation of passengers or property or in connection therewith, contravenes the national transportation policy declared in this Act, or is in contravention of any provision of this part, the Commission may prescribe such just and reasonable minimum rate or charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice as in its judgment may be necessary or desirable in the public interest and to promote such policy and will not be in contravention of any provision of this part. Such minimum rate or charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice, so prescribed by the Commission, shall give no advantage or preference to any such carrier in competition with any common carrier by motor vehicle subject to this part, which the Commission may find to be undue or inconsistent with the public interest and the national transportation policy declared in this Act, and the Commission shall give due consideration to the cost of the services rendered by such carriers, and to the effect of such minimum rate or charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice, upon the movement of traffic by such carriers. All complaints shall state fully the facts complained of and the reasons for such complaint and shall be made under oath.'

"(c) Subsection (c) of such section 218 (which relates to inquiries as to the lawfulness of reductions in charges of contract carriers by motor vehicle, and suspension of such charges) is amended to read as follows:

"'(c) Whenever there shall be filed with the Commission by any contract carrier any schedule stating a charge for a new service or a reduced charge directly, or by means of any rule, regulation, or practice, for the transportation of passengers or property in interstate or foreign commerce, the Commission is hereby authorized and empowered upon complaint of interested parties or upon its own initiative at once and, if it so orders, without answer or other formal pleading by the interested party, but upon reasonable notice, to enter upon a hearing concerning the lawfulness of such charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice, and pending such hearing and the decision thereon the Commission, by filing with such schedule and delivering to the carrier affected thereby a statement in writing of its reasons for such suspension, may from time to time suspend the operation of such schedule and defer the use of such charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice, but not for a longer period than seven months beyond the time when it would otherwise go into effect; and after hearing, whether completed before or after the charge, or rule, regulation, or practice goes into effect, the Commission may make such order with reference thereto as would be proper in a proceeding instituted after it had become effective. If the proceeding has not been concluded and an order made within the period of suspension, the proposed change in any charge or rule, regulation, or practice shall go into effect at the end of such period: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to any initial schedule or schedules filed on or before July 31, 1938, by any such carrier in bona fide operation when this section takes effect. The rule as to burden of proof specified in section 216 (g) shall apply to this paragraph.'

"ACCOUNTS, RECORDS, AND REPORTS OF MOTOR CARRIERS

"SEC. 24. Section 220 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 220. (a) The Commission is hereby authorized to require annual, periodical, or special reports from all motor carriers, brokers, and lessors (as defined in this section), to prescribe the manner and form in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers, brokers, and lessors specific and full, true, and correct answers to all questions upon which the Commission may deem information to be necessary. Such annual reports shall give an account of the affairs of the carrier, broker, or lessor in such form and detail as may be prescribed by the Commission. The Commission may also require any motor carrier or broker to file with it a true copy of any contract, agreement, or arrangement between such carrier and any other carrier or person in relation to any traffic affected by the provisions of this part. The Commission shall not, however, make public any contract, agreement, or arrangement between a contract carrier by motor vehicle and a shipper, or any of the terms or conditions thereof, except as a part of the record in a formal proceeding where it considers such action consistent with the public interest: Provided, That if it appears from an examination of any such contract that it fails to conform to the published schedule of the contract carrier by motor vehicle as required by section 218 (a), the Commission may, in its discretion, make public such of the provisions of the contract as the Commission considers necessary to disclose such failure and the extent thereof.

"'(b) Said annual reports shall contain all the required information for the period of twelve months ending on the thirty-first day of December in each year, unless the Commission shall specify a different date, and shall be made out under oath and filed with the Commission at its office in Washington within three months after the close of the year for which the report is made, unless additional time be granted in any case by the Commission. Such periodical or special reports as may be required by the Commission under subsection (a) hereof shall also be under oath, whenever the Commission so requires.

"'(c) The Commission may prescribe for motor carriers the classes of property for which depreciation charges may properly be included under operating expenses, and the rate or rates of depreciation which shall be charged with respect to each of such classes of property, classifying the carriers as it may deem proper for this purpose. The Commission may, when it deems necessary, modify the classes and rates so prescribed. When the Commission shall have exercised its authority under the foregoing provisions of this subsection, motor carriers shall not charge to operating expenses any depreciation charges on classes of property other than those prescribed by the Commission, or charge with respect to any class of property a rate of depreciation other than that prescribed therefor by the Commission, and no such carrier shall include under operating expenses any depreciation charge in any form whatsoever other than as prescribed by the Commission.

"'(d) The Commission may, in its discretion, prescribe the forms of any and all accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by motor carriers, brokers, and lessors, including the accounts, records, and memoranda of the movement of traffic, as well as of the receipts and expenditures of moneys; and it shall be unlawful for such carriers, brokers, and lessors to keep any accounts, records, and memoranda contrary to any rules, regulations, or orders of the Commission with respect thereto. The Commission may issue orders specifying such operating, accounting, or financial papers, records, books, blanks, tickets, stubs, correspondence, or documents of motor carriers, brokers, or lessors as may after a reasonable time be destroyed, and prescribing the length of time the same shall be preserved. The Commission or its duly authorized special agents, accountants, or examiners shall at all times have access to and authority, under its order, to inspect and examine any and all lands, buildings, or equipment of motor carriers, brokers, and lessors; and shall have authority to inspect and copy any and all accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents of such carriers, brokers, and lessors, and such accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents of any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with any such carrier, as the Commission deems relevant to such person's relation to or transactions with such carrier. Motor carriers, brokers, lessors, and persons shall submit their accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents for the inspection and copying authorized by this paragraph, and motor carriers, brokers, and lessors shall submit their lands, buildings, and equipment for examination and inspection, to any duly authorized special agent, accountant, or examiner of the Commission upon demand and the display of proper credentials.

"'(e) As used in this section, the words "keep" and "kept" shall be construed to mean made, prepared, or compiled, as well as retained; the term "lessor" means a lessor of any right to operate as a motor carrier; and the term "motor carrier", "broker", or "lessor" includes a receiver or trustee of any such motor carrier, broker, or lessor.

"'(f) No report by any motor carrier of any accident arising in the course of the operations of such carrier, made pursuant to any requirement of the Commission, and no report by the Commission of any investigation of any such accident, shall be admitted as evidence, or used for any other purpose, in any suit or action for damages growing out of any matter mentioned in such report or investigation.'

"AMENDMENTS TO SECTIONS 221 AND 222

"'(d) Any special agent, accountant, or examiner who knowingly and willfully divulges any fact or information which may come to his knowledge during the course of any examination or inspection made under authority of section 220, except as he may be directed by the Commission or by a court or judge thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment for not exceeding six months, or both.'

"(d) Subsection (g) of such section 222 (which imposes penalties for failure or refusal to make reports, keep accounts, and so forth) is amended to read as follows:

"'(g) Any motor carrier, broker, or other person, or any officer, agent, employee, or representative thereof, who shall willfully fail or refuse to make a report to the Commission as required by this part, or to make specific and full, true, and correct answer to any question within thirty days from the time it is lawfully required by the Commission so to do, or to keep accounts, records, and memoranda in the form and manner prescribed by the Commission, or shall knowingly and willfully falsify, destroy, mutilate, or alter any such report, account, record, or memorandum, or shall knowingly and willfully file with the Commission any false report, account, record, or memorandum, or shall knowingly and willfully neglect or fail to make full, true, and correct entries in such accounts, records, or memoranda of all facts and transactions appertaining to the business of the carrier, or person required under this part to keep the same, or shall knowingly and willfully keep any accounts, records, or memoranda contrary to the rules, regulations, or orders of the Commission with respect thereto, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof be subject for each offense to a fine of not more than $5,000. As used in this subsection, the words "keep" and "kept" shall be construed to mean made, prepared, or compiled, as well as retained.'

"'DEFINITIONS

"'SEC. 302. For the purposes of this part—

"'(a) The term "person" includes any individual, firm, copartnership, corporation, company, association, joint stock association, and any trustee, receiver, assignee, or personal representative thereof.

"'(b) The term "Commission" means the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"'(c) The term "water carrier" means a common carrier by water or a contract carrier by water.

"'(d) The term "common carrier by water" means any person which holds itself out to the general public to engage in the transportation by water in interstate or foreign commerce of passengers or property or any class or classes thereof for compensation, except transportation by water by an express company subject to part I in the conduct of its express business, which shall be considered to be and shall be regulated as transportation subject to part I.

"'(e) The term "contract carrier by water" means any person which, under individual contracts or agreements, engages in the transportation (other than transportation referred to in paragraph (d) and the exception therein) by water of passengers or property in interstate or foreign commerce for compensation. The furnishing for compensation (under a charter, lease, or other agreement) of a vessel, to a person other than a carrier subject to this Act, to be used by the person to whom such vessel is furnished in the transportation of its own property, shall be considered to constitute, as to the vessel so furnished, engaging in transportation for compensation by the person furnishing such vessel, within the meaning of the foregoing definition of "contract carrier by water". Whenever the Commission, upon its own motion or upon application of any interested party, determines that the application of the preceding sentence to any person or class of persons is not necessary in order to effectuate the national transportation policy declared in this Act, it shall by order exempt such person or class of persons from the provisions of this part for such period of time as may be specified in such order. The Commission may by order revoke any such exemption whenever it shall find that the application of such sentence to the exempted person or class of persons is necessary in order to effectuate such national transportation policy. No such exemption shall be denied or revoked except after reasonable opportunity for hearing.

"'(f) The term "vessel" means any watercraft or other artificial contrivance of whatever description which is used, or is capable of being, or is intended to be, used as a means of transportation by water.

"'(g) The term "transportation facility" includes any vessel, warehouse, wharf, pier, dock, yard, grounds, or any other instrumentality or equipment of any kind, used in or in connection with transportation by water subject to this part.

"'(h) The term "transportation" includes the use of any transportation facility (irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for such use), and includes any and all services in or in connection with transportation, including the receipt, delivery, elevation, transfer in transit, refrigeration or icing, ventilation, storage, and handling of property transported or the interchange thereof with any other agency of transportation.

"'(i) The term "interstate or foreign transportation" or "transportation in interstate or foreign commerce", as used in this part, means transportation of persons or property—

"'(1) wholly by water from a place in a State to a place in any other State, whether or not such transportation takes place wholly in the United States;

"'(2) partly by water and partly by railroad or motor vehicle, from a place in a State to a place in any other State; except that with respect to such transportation taking place partly in the United States and partly outside thereof, such terms shall include transportation by railroad or motor vehicle only insofar as it takes place within the United States, and shall include transportation by water only insofar as it takes place from a place in the United States to another place in the United States;

"'(3) wholly by water, or partly by water and partly by railroad or motor vehicle, from or to a place in the United States to or from a place outside the United States, but only (A) insofar as such transportation by rail or by motor vehicle takes place within the United States, and (B) in the case of a movement to a place outside the United States, only insofar as such transportation by water takes place from any place in the United States to any other place therein prior to transshipment at a place within the United States for movement to a place outside thereof, and, in the case of a movement from a place outside the United States, only insofar as such transportation by water takes place from any place in the United States to any other place therein after transshipment at a place within the United States in a movement from a place outside thereof.

"'(j) The term "United States" means the States of the United States and the District of Columbia.

"'(k) The term "State" means a State of the United States or the District of Columbia.

"'(l) The term "common carrier by railroad" means a common carrier by railroad subject to the provisions of part I.

"'(m) The term "common carrier by motor vehicle" means a common carrier by motor vehicle subject to the provisions of part II.

"'APPLICATION OF PROVISIONS; EXEMPTIONS

"'SEC. 303. (a) In the case of transportation which is subject both to this part and part I, the provisions of part I shall apply only to the extent that part I imposes, with respect to such transportation, requirements not imposed by the provisions of this part.

"'(b) Nothing in this part shall apply to the transportation by a water carrier of commodities in bulk when the cargo space of the vessel in which such commodities are transported is being used for the carrying of not more than three such commodities. This subsection shall apply only in the case of commodities in bulk which are (in accordance with the existing custom of the trade in the handling and transportation of such commodities as of June 1, 1939) loaded and carried without wrappers or containers and received and delivered by the carrier without transportation mark or count. For the purposes of this subsection two or more vessels while navigated as a unit shall be considered to be a single vessel. This subsection shall not apply to transportation subject, at the time this part takes effect, to the provisions of the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, as amended.

"'(c) Nothing in this part shall apply to transportation by a contract carrier by water of commodities in bulk in a non-ocean-going vessel on a normal voyage during which (1) the cargo space of such vessel is used for the carrying of not more than three such commodities, and (2) such vessel passes within or through waters which are made international for navigation purposes by any treaty to which the United States is a party.

"'(d) Nothing in this part shall apply to the transportation by water of liquid cargoes in bulk in tank vessels designed for use exclusively in such service and certified under regulations approved by the Secretary of Commerce pursuant to the provisions of section 4417a of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., 1934 edition, Supp. IV, title 46, sec. 391a).

"'(e) It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to exclude from the provisions of this part, in addition to the transportation otherwise excluded under this section, transportation by contract carriers by water which, by reason of the inherent nature of the commodities transported, their requirement of special equipment, or their shipment in bulk, is not actually and substantially competitive with transportation by any common carrier subject to this part or part I or part II. Upon application of a carrier, made in such manner and form as the Commission may by regulations prescribe, the Commission shall, subject to such reasonable conditions and limitations as the Commission may prescribe, by order exempt from the provisions of this part such of the transportation engaged in by such carrier as it finds necessary to carry out the policy above declared. A carrier (other than a carrier subject, at the time this part takes effect, to the provisions of the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, as amended) making such application prior to January 1, 1941, shall be exempt from the provisions of this part until a final determination has been made upon such application if such carrier or a predecessor in interest was in bona fide operation as a contract carrier by water on January 1, 1940, over the route or routes or between the ports with respect to which application is made and has so operated since that time (or, if engaged in furnishing seasonal service only, was in bona fide operation during the seasonal period, prior to or including such date, for operations of the character in question) except, in either event, for interruptions of service over which such carrier or its predecessor in interest had no control.

"'(f) Notwithstanding any provision of this section or of section 302, the provisions of this part shall not apply—

"'(1) to transportation by water by a carrier by railroad subject to part I or by a motor carrier subject to part II, incidental to transportation subject to such parts, in the performance within terminal areas of transfer, collection, or delivery services, or in the performance of floatage, car ferry, lighterage, or towage; but such transportation shall be considered to be transportation subject to part I when performed by such carrier by railroad, and transportation subject to part II when performed by such motor carrier.

"'(2) to transportation by water by any person (whether as agent or under a contractual arrangement) for a common carrier by railroad subject to part I, an express company subject to part I, a motor carrier subject to part II, or a water carrier subject to this part, in the performance within terminal areas of transfer, collection, or delivery services, or in the performance of floatage, car ferry, lighterage, or towage; but such transportation shall be considered to be performed by such carrier or express company as part of, and shall be regulated in the same manner as, the transportation by railroad, express, motor vehicle, or water to which such services are incidental.

"'(g) Except to the extent that the Commission shall from time to time find, and by order declare, that such application is necessary to carry out the national transportation policy declared in this Act, the provisions of this part shall not apply (1) to transportation in interstate commerce by water solely within the limits of a single harbor or between places in contiguous harbors, when such transportation is not a part of a continuous through movement under a common control, management, or arrangement to or from a place without the limits of any such harbor or harbors, or (2) to transportation by small craft of not more than one hundred tons carrying capacity or not more than one hundred indicated horsepower, or to vessels carrying passengers only and equipped to carry no more than sixteen passengers, or to ferries, or to the movement by water carriers of contractors' equipment employed or to be employed in construction or repair for such water carrier, or to the operation of salvors.

"'(h) The Commission shall have the power to determine, upon its own motion or upon application of any party in interest, whether any water carrier is engaged solely in transporting the property of a person which owns all or substantially all of the voting stock of such carrier. Upon so finding the Commission shall issue a certificate of exemption to such carrier, and such carrier shall not be subject to the provisions of this part during the period such certificate shall remain in effect. At any time after the issuance of such certificate the Commission may by order revoke such certificate if it finds that such carrier is no longer entitled to the exemption under the foregoing provisions of this subsection. Upon revocation of any such certificate the Commission shall restore to such carrier, without further proceedings, the authority, if any, to engage in transportation subject to the provisions of this part held by such carrier at the time the certificate of exemption pertaining to such carrier became effective. No certificate of exemption shall be denied and no order of revocation shall be issued, under this subsection, except after reasonable opportunity for hearing.

"'(i) In the application of the provisions of this part to any carrier owned or controlled by the United States, no different policy, rule of rate making, system of accounting, or method of determining costs of service, value of property, or rate of return shall be applied than is applied in the case of carriers not so owned or controlled.

"'(j) Nothing in this part shall be construed to interfere with the exclusive exercise by each State of the power to regulate intrastate commerce by water carriers within the jurisdiction of such State.

"'(k) Nothing in this part shall authorize the Commission to prescribe or regulate any rate, fare, or charge for intrastate transportation, or for any service connected therewith, for the purpose of removing discrimination against interstate commerce or for any other purpose.

"'(l) Whenever transportation exempted under the provisions of subsection (g), or by order of the Commission under subsection (e), becomes subject to the provisions of this part, the carrier may continue to engage in such transportation for a period of one hundred and twenty days without a certificate or permit covering such transportation, and, if application for a certificate or permit covering such transportation is made to the Commission within such period, the Commission shall, without further proceedings, issue to the carrier a certificate or permit, whichever is appropriate, authorizing such transportation previously exempted.

"'GENERAL POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE COMMISSION

"'SEC. 304. (a) It shall be the duty of the Commission to administer the provisions of this part, and to that end the Commission shall have authority to make and amend such general or special rules and regulations and to issue such orders as may be necessary to carry out such provisions.

"'(b) The Commission shall have authority, for purposes of the administration of the provisions of this part, to inquire into and report on the management of the business of water carriers, and to inquire into and report on the management of the business of persons controlling, controlled by, or under a common control with water carriers, to the extent that the business of such persons is related to the management of the business of one or more such carriers, and the Commission shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same are conducted. The Commission may obtain from such carriers and persons such information as the Commission deems necessary to carry out the provisions of this part; and may transmit to Congress from time to time, such recommendations (including recommendations as to additional legislation) as the Commission may deem necessary.

"'(c) The Commission may establish from time to time such just and reasonable classifications of groups of carriers included in the terms "common carrier by water", or "contract carrier by water", as the special nature of the services performed by such carriers shall require; and such just and reasonable rules, regulations, and requirements consistent with the provisions of this part to be observed by the carriers so classified or grouped, as the Commission, after hearing, finds necessary or desirable in the public interest.

"'(d) Whenever it shall appear from complaint made to the Commission or otherwise that the rates, fares, regulations, or practices of persons engaged in transportation by water to or from a port or ports of any foreign country in competition with common carriers by water or contract carriers by water, cause undue disadvantage to such carriers by reason of such competition, the Commission may relieve such carriers from the provisions of this part to such extent, and for such time, and in such manner as in its judgment may be necessary to avoid or lessen such undue disadvantage, consistently with the public interest and the national transportation policy declared in this Act.

"'(e) Upon complaint in writing to the Commission by any person, or upon its own initiative without complaint, the Commission may investigate whether any water carrier has failed to comply with any provision of this part or with any requirement established pursuant thereto, and if, after notice of and hearing upon any such investigation, the Commission finds that any such carrier has failed to comply with any such provision or requirement, it shall issue an appropriate order to compel such carrier to comply therewith. Whenever the Commission is of opinion that any complaint does not state reasonable grounds for action on its part, it may dismiss such complaint.

"'RATES, FARES, CHARGES, AND PRACTICES; THROUGH ROUTES

"'SEC. 305. (a) It shall be the duty of every common carrier by water, with respect to transportation subject to this part which it undertakes or holds itself out to perform, or which it is required by or under authority of this part to perform, to provide and furnish such transportation upon reasonable request therefor, and to establish, observe, and enforce just and reasonable rates, fares, charges, and classifications, and just and reasonable regulations and practices, relating thereto and to the issuance, form, and substance of tickets, receipts, bills of lading, and manifests, the manner and method of presenting, marking, packing, and delivering property for transportation, the carrying of personal, sample, and excess baggage, the facilities for transportation, and all other matters relating to or connected with such transportation in interstate or foreign commerce. All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, shall be just and reasonable, and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service or any part thereof is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

"'(b) It shall be the duty of common carriers by water to establish reasonable through routes with other such carriers and with common carriers by railroad, for the transportation of persons or property, and just and reasonable rates, fares, charges, and classifications applicable thereto, and to provide reasonable facilities for operating such through routes, and to make reasonable rules and regulations with respect to their operation and providing for reasonable compensation to those entitled thereto. Common carriers by water may establish reasonable through routes and rates, fares, charges, and classifications applicable thereto with common carriers by motor vehicle. In the case of joint rates, fares, or charges it shall be the duty of the carriers parties thereto to establish just, reasonable, and equitable divisions thereof, which shall not unduly prefer or prejudice any of such carriers.

"'(c) It shall be unlawful for any common carrier by water to make, give, or cause any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, port, port district, gateway, transit point, locality, region, district, territory, or description of traffic in any respect whatsoever; or to subject any particular person, port, port district, gateway, transit point, locality, region, district, territory, or description of traffic to any unjust discrimination or any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever: Provided, That this subsection shall not be construed to apply to discriminations, prejudice, or disadvantage to the traffic of any other carrier of whatever description. Differences in the classifications, rates, fares, charges, rules, regulations, and practices of a water carrier in respect of water transportation from those in effect by a rail carrier with respect to rail transportation shall not be deemed to constitute unjust discrimination, prejudice, or disadvantage, or an unfair or destructive competitive practice, within the meaning of any provision of this Act.

"'(d) All common carriers by water shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities for the interchange of traffic between their respective lines and connecting lines, and for the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of passengers or property to and from connecting lines; and shall not discriminate in their rates, fares, and charges between connecting lines, or unduly prejudice any connecting line in the distribution of traffic that is not specifically routed by the shipper. As used in this subsection the term "connecting line" means the connecting line of any common carrier by water or any common carrier subject to part I.

"'TARIFFS AND SCHEDULES

"'SEC. 306. (a) Every common carrier by water shall file with the Commission, and print, and keep open to public inspection tariffs showing all rates, fares, charges, classifications, rules, regulations, and practices for the transportation in interstate or foreign commerce of passengers and property between places on its own route, and between such places and places on the route of any other such carrier or on the route of any common carrier by railroad or by motor vehicle, when a through route and joint rate shall have been established. Such tariffs shall plainly state the places between which property or passengers will be carried, the classification of property or passengers and, separately, all terminal charges, or other charges which the Commission shall require to be so stated, all privileges or facilities granted or allowed, and any rules or regulations which in anywise change, affect, or determine any part or the aggregate of such rates, fares, or charges, or the value of the service rendered to the passenger, shipper, or consignee.

"'(b) All charges of common carriers by water shall be stated in lawful money of the United States. The Commission shall by regulations prescribe the form and manner in which the tariffs required by this section shall be published, filed, and posted; and the Commission is authorized to reject any tariff filed with it which is not in accordance with this section and with such regulations. Any tariff so rejected by the Commission shall be void and its use shall be unlawful.

"'(c) No common carrier by water shall charge or demand or collect or receive a greater or less or different compensation for transportation subject to this part or for any service in connection therewith than the rates, fares, or charges specified for such transportation or such service in the tariffs lawfully in effect; and no such carrier shall refund or remit in any manner or by any device any portion of the rates, fares, or charges so specified, or extend to any person any privileges or facilities for transportation affecting the value thereof except such as are specified in its tariff: Provided, That the provisions of sections 1 (7) and 22 of part I (which relate to transportation free and at reduced rates), together with such other provisions of such part (including penalties) as may be necessary for the enforcement of such provisions, shall apply to common carriers by water.

"'(d) No common carrier by water, unless otherwise provided by this part, shall engage in transportation subject to this part unless the rates, fares, and charges upon which the same are transported by said carrier have been filed and published in accordance with the provisions of this part. No change shall be made in any rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice specified in any effective tariff of a common carrier by water except after thirty days' notice of the proposed change filed and posted in accordance with this section. Such notice shall plainly state the change proposed to be made and the time when such change will take effect. The Commission may, in its discretion and for good cause shown, allow changes upon notice less than that herein specified, or modify the requirements of this section, either in particular instances or by general order applicable to special circumstances or conditions.

"'(e) It shall be the duty of every contract carrier by water to establish and observe reasonable minimum rates and charges for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property or in connection therewith and to establish and observe reasonable regulations, and practices to be applied in connection with said reasonable minimum rates and charges. It shall be the duty of every contract carrier by water to file with the Commission, post, and keep open for public inspection, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Commission shall prescribe, schedules of minimum rates or charges actually maintained and charged for interstate and foreign transportation to which it is a party, and any rule, regulation, or practice affecting such charges and the value of the service thereunder. No contract carrier by water, unless otherwise provided by this part, shall engage in transportation subject to this part unless the minimum rates or charges actually maintained and charged have been published, filed, and posted in accordance with the provisions of this part. No new rate or charge shall be established and no reduction shall be made in any rate or charge, either directly or by means of any change in any rule, regulation, or practice affecting such rate or charge, or the value of service thereunder, except after thirty days' notice of the proposed new rate or charge, or of the proposed change, filed in accordance with this section. The Commission may, in its discretion and for good cause shown, allow the establishment of any such new rate or charge, or any such change, upon notice less than herein specified, or modify the requirement of this section with respect to posting and filing of such schedules, either in particular instances or by general order applicable to special or peculiar circumstances or conditions. Such notice shall plainly state the new rate or charge, or the change proposed to be made, and the time when it will take effect. It shall be unlawful for any such carrier to transport passengers or property or to furnish facilities or services in connection therewith for a less compensation, either directly or by means of a change in the terms and conditions of any contract, charter, agreement, or undertaking, than the rates or charges so filed with the Commission: Provided, That the Commission, in its discretion and for good cause shown, either upon application of any such carrier or carriers, or any class or group thereof, or upon its own initiative may, after hearing, grant relief from the provisions of this subsection to such extent, and for such time, and in such manner as, in its judgment, is consistent with the public interest and the national transportation policy declared in this Act.

"'COMMISSION'S AUTHORITY OVER RATES, AND SO FORTH

"'SEC. 307. (a) Any person may make complaint in writing to the Commission that any individual or joint rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice of any common carrier by water or any contract carrier by water is or will be in violation of this part. Every complaint shall state fully the facts complained of and the reasons for such complaint and shall be made under oath.

"'(b) Whenever, after hearing, upon complaint or in an investigation on its own initiative, the Commission shall be of opinion that any individual or joint rate, fare, or charge demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers by water for transportation subject to this part, or any regulation, practice, or classification of such carrier or carriers relating to such transportation, is or will be unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any provision of this part, it may determine and prescribe the lawful rate, fare, or charge or the maximum or minimum, or maximum and minimum rate, fare, or charge thereafter to be observed, or the lawful regulation, practice, or classification thereafter to be made effective.

"'(c) In any proceeding to determine the justness or reasonableness of any rate, fare, or charge of any common carrier by water there shall not be taken into consideration or allowed as evidence or elements of value of the property of such carrier either goodwill, earning power, or the certificate under which such carrier is operating; and in applying for and receiving a certificate under this part any such carrier shall be deemed to have agreed to the provisions of this subsection on its own behalf and on behalf of all transferees of such certificate.

"'(d) The Commission may, and it shall whenever deemed by it to be necessary or desirable in the public interest, after full hearing upon complaint or upon its own initiative without a complaint, establish through routes, joint classifications, and joint rates, fares, or charges, applicable to the transportation of passengers or property by common carriers by water, or by such carriers and carriers by railroad, or the maxima or minima, or maxima and minima, to be charged, and the divisions of such rates, fares, or charges as hereinafter provided, and the terms and conditions under which such through routes shall be operated. In the case of a through route, where one of the carriers is a common carrier by water, the Commission shall prescribe such reasonable differentials as it may find to be justified between all-rail rates and the joint rates in connection with such common carrier by water. The Commission shall not, however, establish any through route, classification, or practice, or any rate, fare, or charge, between street electric passenger railways not engaged in the general business of transporting freight in addition to their passenger and express business, and common carriers by water. If any tariff or schedule canceling any through route or joint rate, fare, charge, or classification, without the consent of all carriers parties thereto or authorization by the Commission, is suspended by the Commission for investigation, the burden of proof shall be upon the carrier or carriers proposing such cancelation to show that it is consistent with the public interest, without regard to the provisions of paragraph (4) of section 15.

"'(e) Whenever, after hearing upon complaint or upon its own initiative, the Commission is of opinion that the divisions of joint rates, fares, or charges, applicable to the transportation of passengers or property by common carriers by water, or by such carriers and common carriers by railroad or by motor vehicle, are or will be unjust, unreasonable, inequitable, or unduly preferential or prejudicial as between the carriers parties thereto, the Commission shall by order prescribe the just, reasonable, and equitable divisions thereof to be received by the several carriers. In cases where the joint rate, fare, or charge, was established pursuant to a finding or order of the Commission and the divisions thereof are found by it to have been unjust, unreasonable, or inequitable, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, the Commission may also by order determine what (for the period subsequent to the filing of the complaint or petition or the making of the order of investigation) would have been the just, reasonable, and equitable divisions thereof to be received by the several carriers, and require adjustment to be made in accordance therewith. In so prescribing and determining the divisions of joint rates, fares and charges, the Commission shall give due consideration, among other things, to the efficiency with which the carriers concerned are operated, the amount of revenue required to pay their respective operating expenses, taxes, and a fair return on their property held for and used in the service of transportation, and the importance to the public of the transportation services of such carriers and also whether any particular participating carrier is an originating, intermediate, or delivering line, and any other fact or circumstance which would ordinarily, without regard to the mileage haul, entitle one carrier to a greater or less proportion than another carrier of the joint rate, fare, or charge.

"'(f) In the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates, fares, and charges of common carriers by water, and classifications, regulations, and practices relating thereto, the Commission shall give due consideration, among other factors, to the effect of rates upon the movement of traffic by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed; to the need, in the public interest, of adequate and efficient water transportation service at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service; and to the need of revenues sufficient to enable water carriers, under honest, economical, and efficient management, to provide such service.

"'(g) Whenever there shall be filed with the Commission any schedule (except a schedule referred to in section 322) stating a new rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice for the interstate or foreign transportation of passengers or property by a common carrier or carriers by water, the Commission may upon protest of interested parties or upon its own initiative at once, and, if it so orders, without answer or other formal pleading by such carrier or carriers, but upon reasonable notice, enter upon an investigation concerning the lawfulness of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice, and pending such hearing and the decision thereon, the Commission, by filing with such schedule and delivering to the carrier or carriers affected thereby a statement in writing of its reasons for such suspension, may from time to time suspend the operation of such schedule and defer the use of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice, but not for a longer period than seven months beyond the time when it would otherwise go into effect; and after hearing, whether completed before or after the rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice goes into effect, the Commission may make such order with reference thereto, as would be proper in a proceeding instituted after such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice had become effective. If the proceeding shall not have been concluded and an order made within the period of suspension, the proposed rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice shall go into effect at the end of such period: Provided, however, That this subsection shall not apply to any initial schedule filed prior to October 1, 1941, by any such carrier (other than a carrier subject, at the time this part takes effect, to the provisions of the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, as amended, or the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended) insofar as such schedule names rates on traffic, or for services connected therewith, as to which such carrier was in bona fide operation on January 1, 1940. At any hearing involving a change in a rate, fare, charge, or classification, or in a rule, regulation, or practice, the burden of proof shall be upon the carrier to show that the proposed changed rate, fare, charge, classification, rule, regulation, or practice is just and reasonable.

"'(h) Whenever, after hearing, upon complaint or its own initiative, the Commission finds that any minimum rate or charge of any contract carrier by water, or any rule, regulation, or practice of any such carrier affecting such minimum rate or charge, or the value of the service thereunder, contravenes the national transportation policy declared in this act, or is in contravention of any provision of this part, the Commission may prescribe such just and reasonable minimum rate or charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice as in its judgment may be necessary or desirable in the public interest and to promote such policy and will not be in contravention of any provision of this part. Such minimum rate or charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice, so prescribed by the Commission, shall give no advantage or preference to any such carrier in competition with any common carrier by water subject to this part, which the Commission may find to be undue or inconsistent with the public interest and the national transportation policy declared in this act, and the Commission shall give due consideration to the cost of the services rendered by such carriers, and to the effect of such minimum rate or charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice, upon the movement of traffic by such carriers. All complaints shall state fully the facts complained of and the reasons for such complaint and shall be made under oath.

"'(i) Whenever there shall be filed with the Commission by any such contract carrier any schedule (except a schedule referred to in section 322) stating a charge for a new service or a reduced charge, directly or by means of any rule, regulation, or practice, for transportation in interstate or foreign commerce, the Commission may upon complaint of interested parties or upon its own initiative at once and, if it so orders, without answer or other formal pleading by the interested party, but upon reasonable notice, enter upon a hearing concerning the lawfulness of such charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice, and pending such hearing and the decision thereon the Commission, by filing with such schedule and delivering to the carrier affected thereby a statement in writing of its reasons for such suspension, may from time to time suspend the operation of such schedule and defer the use of such charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice, but not for a longer period than seven months beyond the time when it would otherwise go into effect; and after hearing, whether completed before or after the charge, or rule, regulation, or practice goes into effect, the Commission may make such order with reference thereto as would be proper in a proceeding instituted after it had become effective. If the proceeding has not been concluded and an order made within the period of suspension, the proposed change in any charge or rule, regulation, or practice shall go into effect at the end of such period: Provided, That this subsection shall not apply to any initial schedule filed prior to October 1, 1941, by any such carrier (other than a carrier subject, at the time this part takes effect, to the provisions of the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, as amended, or the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended) insofar as such schedule names charges on traffic, or for services connected therewith, as to which such carrier was in bona fide operation on January 1, 1940. The rule as to burden of proof specified in subsection (g) of this section shall apply to this subsection.

"'REPARATION AWARDS; LIMITATION OF ACTIONS

"'SEC. 308. (a) For the purposes of this section the term "carrier" means a water carrier engaged in transportation subject to this part (1) by way of the Panama Canal, or (2) as a common carrier by water on the high seas or the Great Lakes on regular routes from port to port.

"'(b) In case any carrier shall do, cause to be done, or permit to be done any act, matter, or thing in this part prohibited or declared to be unlawful, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this part required to be done, such carrier shall be liable to the person or persons injured thereby for the full amount of damages sustained in consequence of any such violation, together with a reasonable counsel or attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court in every case of recovery, which attorney's fee shall be taxed and collected as part of the costs in the case.

"'(c) Any person or persons claiming to be damaged by any carrier may either make complaint to the Commission or may bring suit in his or their own behalf for the recovery of the damages for which such carrier may be liable under the provisions of subsection (b), in any district court of the United States of competent jurisdiction; but such person or persons shall not have the right to pursue both of said remedies.

"'(d) If, after hearing on a complaint, the Commission shall determine that any party complainant is entitled to an award of damages under the provisions of this part for a violation thereof by any carrier, the Commission shall make an order directing the carrier to pay to the complainant the sum to which he is entitled on or before a day named.

"'(e) If such carrier does not comply with an order for the payment of money within the time limit in such order, the complainant, or any person for whose benefit such order was made, may file with the district court of the United States for the district in which he or it resides or in which is located the principal operating office of such carrier or in which is located any port of call on a route operated by such carrier, or in any State court of general jurisdiction having jurisdiction of the parties, a complaint setting forth briefly the causes for which he claims damages, and the order of the Commission in the premises. Such suit in the district court of the United States shall proceed in all respects like other civil suits for damages, except that on the trial of such suit the findings and order of the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, and except that the plaintiff shall not be liable for costs in the district court nor for costs at any subsequent stage of the proceedings unless they accrue upon his appeal. If the plaintiff shall finally prevail he shall be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee, to be taxed and collected as a part of the costs of the suit.

"'(f) (1) All complaints against carriers for the recovery of damages or overcharges shall be filed with the Commission within three years from the time the cause of action accrues, and not after.

"'(2) The cause of action in respect of a shipment of property shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to accrue upon delivery or tender of delivery thereof by the carrier and not after.

"'(3) A complaint for the enforcement of an order of the Commission for the payment of money shall be filed in the district court or the State court within one year from the date of the order, and not after.

"'(4) The term "overcharges" as used in this section means charges for transportation services in excess of those applicable thereto under the tariffs lawfully on file with the Commission.

"'(5) The provisions of this subsection (f) shall take effect six months after this section becomes effective and extend to and embrace cases in which the cause of action has heretofore accrued.

"'(g) In such suits all parties in whose favor the Commission may have made an award of damages by a single order may be joined as plaintiffs, and all of the carriers parties to such order awarding such damages may be joined as defendants, and such suit may be maintained by such joint plaintiffs and against such joint defendants in any district where any one of such joint plaintiffs could maintain such suit against any one of such joint defendants; and service of process against any one of such defendants as may not be found in the district where the suit is brought may be made in any district where such defendant has his or its principal operating office. In case of such joint suit the recovery, if any, may be by judgment in favor of any one of such plaintiffs, against the defendant found to be liable to such plaintiff.

"'CERTIFICATES OF PUBLIC CONVENIENCE AND NECESSITY AND PERMITS

"'SEC. 309. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this section and section 311, no common carrier by water shall engage in transportation subject to this part unless it holds a certificate of public convenience and necessity issued by the Commission: Provided, however, That, subject to section 310, if any such carrier or a predecessor in interest was in bona fide operation as a common carrier by water on January 1, 1940, over the route or routes or between the ports with respect to which application is made and has so operated since that time (or, if engaged in furnishing seasonal service only, was in bona fide operation during the seasonal period, prior to or including such date, for operations of the character in question) except, in either event, as to interruptions of service over which the applicant or its predecessor in interest had no control, the Commission shall issue such certificate without requiring further proof that public convenience and necessity will be served by such operation, and without further proceedings, if application for such certificate is made to the Commission as provided in subsection (b) of this section and prior to the expiration of one hundred and twenty days after this section takes effect. Pending the determination of any such application, the continuance of such operation shall be lawful. If the application for such certificate is not made within one hundred and twenty days after this section takes effect, it shall be decided in accordance with the standards and procedure provided for in subsection (c), and such certificate shall be issued or denied accordingly. Any person, not included within the provisions of the foregoing proviso, who is engaged in transportation as a common carrier by water when this section takes effect may continue such operation for a period of one hundred and twenty days thereafter without a certificate, and, if application for such certificate is made to the Commission within such period, the continuance of such operation shall be lawful pending determination of such application.

"'(b) Application for a certificate shall be made in writing to the Commission, be verified under oath, and shall be in such form and contain such information and be accompanied by proof of service upon such interested parties as the Commission shall, by regulations, require.

"'(c) Subject to section 310, upon application as provided in this section the Commission shall issue a certificate to any qualified applicant therefor, authorizing the whole or any part of the operations covered by the application, if the Commission finds that the applicant is fit, willing, and able properly to perform the service proposed and to conform to the provisions of this part and the requirements, rules, and regulations of the Commission thereunder, and that the proposed service, to the extent authorized by the certificate, is or will be required by the present or future public convenience and necessity; otherwise such application shall be denied.

"'(d) Such certificate shall specify the route or routes over which, or the ports to and from which, such carrier is authorized to operate, and, at the time of issuance and from time to time thereafter, there shall be attached to the exercise of the privileges granted by such certificate such reasonable terms, conditions, and limitations as the public convenience and necessity may from time to time require, including terms, conditions, and limitations as to the extension of the route or routes of the carrier, and such other terms, and conditions, and limitations as are necessary to carry out, with respect to the operations of the carrier, the requirements of this part or those established by the Commission pursuant thereto: Provided, however, That no terms, conditions, or limitations shall restrict the right of the carrier to add to its equipment, facilities, or service within the scope of such certificate, as the development of the business and the demands of the public shall require, or the right of the carrier to extend its services over uncompleted portions of waterway projects now or hereafter authorized by Congress, over the completed portions of which it already operates, as soon as such uncompleted portions are open for navigation.

"'(e) No certificate issued under this part shall confer any proprietary or exclusive right or rights in the use of public waterways.

"'(f) Except as otherwise provided in this section and section 311, no person shall engage in the business of a contract carrier by water unless he or it holds an effective permit, issued by the Commission authorizing such operation: Provided, That, subject to section 310, if any such carrier or a predecessor in interest was in bona fide operation as a contract carrier by water on January 1, 1940, over the route or routes or between the ports with respect to which application is made, and has so operated since that time (or, if engaged in furnishing seasonal service only, was in bona fide operation during the seasonal period, prior to or including such date, for operations of the character in question) except, in either event, as to interruptions of service over which the applicant or its predecessor in interest had no control, the Commission shall issue such permit, without further proceedings, if application for such permit is made to the Commission as provided in subsection (g) of this section and prior to the expiration of one hundred and twenty days after this section takes effect. Pending the determination of any such application, the continuance of such operation shall be lawful. If the application for such permit is not made within one hundred and twenty days after this section takes effect, it shall be decided in accordance with the standards and procedure provided for in subsection (g), and such permit shall be issued or denied accordingly. Any person, not included within the provision of the foregoing proviso, who is engaged in transportation as a contract carrier by water when this section takes effect may continue such operation for a period of one hundred and twenty days thereafter without a permit, and, if application for such permit is made to the Commission within such period, the continuance of such operation shall be lawful pending the determination of such application.

"'(g) Application for such permit shall be made to the Commission in writing, be verified under oath, and shall be in such form and contain such information and be accompanied by proof of service upon such interested parties as the Commission shall, by regulations, require. Subject to section 310, upon application the Commission shall issue such permit if it finds that the applicant is fit, willing, and able properly to perform the service proposed and to conform to the provisions of this part and the requirements, rules, and regulations of the Commission thereunder, and that such operation will be consistent with the public interest and the national transportation policy declared in this act. The business of the carrier and the scope thereof shall be specified in such permit and there shall be attached thereto at time of issuance and from time to time thereafter such reasonable terms, conditions, and limitations, consistent with the character of the holder as a contract carrier by water, as are necessary to carry out the requirements of this part or those lawfully established by the Commission pursuant thereto: Provided, however, That no terms, conditions, or limitations shall restrict the right of the carrier to substitute or add contracts within the scope of the permit, or to add to his equipment, facilities, or service, within the scope of the permit, as the development of the business and the demands of the carrier's patrons shall require.

"'DUAL OPERATIONS UNDER CERTIFICATES AND PERMITS

"'SEC. 310. Unless, for good cause shown, the Commission shall find, or shall have found, that both a certificate and a permit may be so held consistently with the public interest and with the national transportation policy declared in this act—

"'(1) no person, or any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with such person, shall hold a certificate as a common carrier by water if such person, or any such controlling person, controlled person, or person under common control, holds a permit as a contract carrier by water; and

"'(2) no person, or any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with such person, shall hold a permit as a contract carrier by water if such person, or any such controlling person, controlled person, or person under common control, holds a certificate as a common carrier by water.

"'TEMPORARY OPERATIONS

"'SEC. 311. (a) To enable the provision of service for which there is an immediate and urgent need to a point or points or within a territory having no carrier service capable of meeting such need, the Commission may, in its discretion and without hearings or other proceedings, grant temporary authority for such service by a common carrier by water or a contract carrier by water, as the case may be. Such temporary authority shall be valid for such time as the Commission shall specify but not for more than an aggregate of one hundred and eighty days, and shall create no presumption that corresponding permanent authority will be granted thereafter.

"'(b) Pending the determination of an application filed with the Commission under this act for approval of a consolidation or merger of the properties of two or more water carriers, or of a purchase, lease, or contract to operate the properties of one or more water carriers, the Commission may, for good cause shown, and without hearings or other proceedings, grant temporary approval, for a period not exceeding one hundred and eighty days, of operation of the properties of such carriers by water by the person proposing to acquire them, as aforesaid.

"'TRANSFER OF CERTIFICATES AND PERMITS

"'SEC. 312. Except as provided in this part, any such certificate or permit may be transferred in accordance with such regulations as the Commission shall prescribe for the protection of the public interest and to insure compliance with the provisions of this part.

"'ACCOUNTS, RECORDS, AND REPORTS

"'SEC. 313. (a) The Commission is hereby authorized to require annual, periodical, or special reports from water carriers and lessors (as defined in this section), and to prescribe the manner and form in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers and lessors specific and full, true, and correct answers to all questions upon which the Commission may deem information to be necessary. Such annual reports shall give an account of the affairs of the carrier or lessor in such form and detail as may be prescribed by the Commission. Said annual reports shall contain all the required information for the period of twelve months ending on the thirty-first day of December in each year, unless the Commission shall specify a different date, and shall be made out under oath and filed with the Commission at its office in Washington within three months after the close of the year for which the report is made, unless additional time be granted in any case by the Commission. Such periodical or special reports as may be required by the Commission under this paragraph shall also be under oath whenever the Commission so requires.

"'(b) The Commission may also require any such carrier to file with it a true copy of any contract, charter, or agreement between such carrier and any other carrier or person in relation to transportation facilities, service, or traffic affected by the provisions of this part. The Commission shall not, however, make public any contract, charter, or agreement between a contract carrier by water and a shipper, or any of the terms or conditions thereof, except as a part of the record in a formal proceeding where it considers such action consistent with the public interest: Provided, That if it appears from an examination of any such contract that it fails to conform to the published schedule of the contract carrier by water as required by section 306 (e), the Commission may, in its discretion, make public such of the provisions of the contract as the Commission considers necessary to disclose such failure and the extent thereof.

"'(c) The Commission may, in its discretion, for the purpose of enabling it the better to carry out the purposes of this part, prescribe a uniform system of accounts applicable to any class of water carriers, and a period of time within which such class shall have such uniform system of accounts, and the manner in which such accounts shall be kept.

"'(d) The Commission shall, as soon as practicable, prescribe for water carriers the classes of property for which depreciation charges may properly be included under operating expenses, and the rate or rates of depreciation which shall be charged with respect to each of such classes of property, classifying the carriers as it may deem proper for this purpose. The Commission may, when it deems necessary, modify the classes and rates so prescribed. When the Commission shall have exercised its authority under the foregoing provisions of this subsection, water carriers shall not charge to operating expenses any depreciation charges on classes of property other than those prescribed by the Commission, or charge with respect to any class of property a rate of depreciation other than that prescribed therefor by the Commission, and no such carrier shall in any case include under operating expenses any depreciation charge in any form whatsoever other than as prescribed by the Commission.

"'(e) The Commission may, in its discretion, prescribe the forms of any and all accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by water carriers and lessors, including the accounts, records, and memoranda of the movement of traffic, as well as of the receipts and expenditures of money, and it shall be unlawful for such carriers or lessors to keep any accounts, records, and memoranda contrary to any rules, regulations, or orders of the Commission with respect thereto.

"'(f) The Commission or its duly authorized special agents, accountants, or examiners shall have authority to inspect and copy any and all accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents, of such water carriers and lessors, and such accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents of any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with any such carrier as the Commission deems relevant to such person's relation to or transactions with such carrier. The Commission or its duly authorized special agents, accountants, or examiners shall at all times have access to all lands, buildings, or equipment of such carriers or lessors, and shall have authority under its order to inspect and examine any and all such lands, buildings, and equipment. All such carriers, lessors, and persons shall submit their accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents for the inspection and for copying authorized by this paragraph, and such carriers and lessors shall submit their lands, buildings, and equipment for inspection and examination, to any duly authorized special agent, accountant, or examiner of the Commission, upon demand and the display of proper credentials.

"'(g) The Commission may issue orders specifying such operating, accounting, or financial papers, records, books, blanks, tickets, stubs, correspondence, or documents of water carriers or lessors as may, after a reasonable time, be destroyed, and prescribing the length of time the same shall be preserved.

"'(h) As used in this section, the words "keep" and "kept" shall be construed to mean made, prepared, or compiled, as well as retained; the term "lessor" means a lessor of any right to operate as a water carrier; and the term "water carrier" or "lessor" includes a receiver or trustee of such water carrier or lessor.

"'ALLOWANCES TO SHIPPERS FOR TRANSPORTATION SERVICES

"'SEC. 314. If the owner of property transported under this part directly or indirectly renders any service connected with such transportation, or furnishes any instrumentality used therein, the charge and allowance therefor shall be published in tariffs or schedules filed in the manner provided in this part and shall be no more than is just and reasonable; and the Commission may, after hearing on a complaint or on its own initiative, determine what is a reasonable charge as the maximum to be paid by the carrier or carriers for the services so rendered or for the use of the instrumentality so furnished, and fix the same by appropriate order.

"'NOTICES, ORDERS, AND SERVICE OF PROCESS

"'SEC. 315. (a) It shall be the duty of every water carrier to file with the Commission a designation in writing of the name and post-office address of an agent upon whom or which service of notices or orders may be made under this part. Such designation may from time to time be changed by like writing similarly filed. Service of notices or orders in proceedings under this part may be made upon such carrier by personal service upon it or upon an agent so designated by it, or by registered mail addressed to it or to such agent at the address filed. In default of such designation, service of any notice or order may be made by posting in the office of the secretary of the Commission. Whenever notice or order is served by mail, as provided herein, the date of mailing shall be considered as the time of service. In proceedings before the Commission involving the lawfulness of rates, fares, charges, classifications, or practices, service of notice upon an attorney in fact of a carrier who has filed a tariff or schedule in behalf of such carrier shall be deemed to be due and sufficient service upon the carrier.

"'(b) No order, based upon a finding that any water carrier has violated any provision of this part, shall be made by the Commission except after hearing upon complaint or after an investigation upon its own initiative.

"'(c) The Commission may suspend, modify, or set aside its orders under this part upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper.

"'(d) Except as otherwise provided in this part, all orders of the Commission, other than orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time, not less than thirty days, as the Commission may prescribe and shall continue in force until its further order, or for a specified period of time, according as shall be prescribed in the order, unless the same shall be suspended, modified, or set aside by the Commission, or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

"'(e) It shall be the duty of every water carrier, its agents and employees, to observe and comply with such orders so long as the same shall remain in effect.

"'ENFORCEMENT AND PROCEDURE

"'SEC. 316. (a) The provisions of section 12 and section 17 of part I, and the Compulsory Testimony Act (27 Stat. 443), and the Immunity of Witnesses Act (34 Stat. 798; 32 Stat. 904, ch. 755, sec. 1), shall apply with full force and effect in the administration and enforcement of this part.

"'(b) If any water carrier fails to comply with or operates in violation of any provision of this part (except provisions as to the reasonableness of rates, fares, or charges, and the discriminatory character thereof), or any rule, regulation, requirement, or order thereunder (except an order for the payment of money), or of any term or condition of any certificate or permit, the Commission or the Attorney General of the United States (or, in case of such an order, any party injured by the failure to comply therewith or by the violation thereof) may apply to any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties for the enforcement of such provision of this part or of such rule, regulation, requirement, order, term, or condition; and such court shall have jurisdiction to enforce obedience thereto by a writ or writs of injunction or other process, mandatory or otherwise, restraining such carrier and any officer, agent, employee, or representative thereof from further violation of such provision of this part or of such rule, regulation, requirement, order, term, or condition and enjoining obedience thereto.

"'(c) The Commission shall enter of record a written report of hearings conducted upon complaint, or upon its own initiative without complaint, stating its conclusions, decision, and order and, if reparation is awarded, the findings of fact upon which the award is made; and shall furnish a copy of such report to all parties of record. The Commission may provide for the publication of such reports in the form best adapted for public information and use, and such authorized publications shall, without further proof or authentication, be received as competent evidence of such reports in any court of competent jurisdiction.

"'(d) Subject to the provisions of section 313, the copies of schedules, and classifications and tariffs of rates, fares, and charges, and of all contracts, agreements, and arrangements of water carriers filed with the Commission as herein provided, and the statistics, tables, and figures contained in the annual or other reports of carriers made to the Commission as required, under the provisions of this part shall be preserved as public records in the custody of the secretary of the Commission, and shall be received as prima facie evidence of what they purport to be for the purpose of investigations by the Commission and in all judicial proceedings; and copies of and extracts from any of said schedules, classifications, tariffs, contracts, agreements, arrangements, or reports, made public records as aforesaid, certified by the secretary, under the Commission's seal, shall be received in evidence with like effect as the originals.

"'UNLAWFUL ACTS AND PENALTIES

"'SEC. 317. (a) Any person who knowingly and willfully violates any provision of this part, or any rule, regulation, requirement, or order thereunder, or any term or condition of any certificate or permit, for which no penalty is otherwise provided, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction in the district in which such offense was in whole or in part committed shall be subject for each offense to a fine not exceeding $500. Each day of such violation shall constitute a separate offense.

"'(b) Any water carrier or any officer, agent, employee, or representative thereof, who shall knowingly and willfully offer, grant, or give, or cause to be offered, granted, or given, any rebate, deferred rebate, or other concession, in violation of the provisions of this part, or who, by any device or means, shall knowingly and willfully assist, or shall willingly suffer or permit, any person to obtain transportation subject to this part at less than the rates, fares, or charges lawfully in effect, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction within the district in which such offense was wholly or in part committed shall be subject for each offense to a fine of not more than $5,000.

"'(c) Any person who shall knowingly and willfully solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, deferred rebate, or other concession in violation of the provisions of this part, or who shall by any device or means, whether with or without the consent or connivance of any water carrier or his or its officer, agent, employee, or representative, knowingly and willfully obtain transportation subject to this part at less than the rates, fares, or charges lawfully in effect, or shall knowingly and willfully, directly or indirectly, by false claim, false billing, false representation, or other device or means, obtain or attempt to obtain any allowance, refund, or repayment in connection with or growing out of such transportation, whether with or without the consent or connivance of such carrier or his or its officer, agent, employee, or representative, whereby the compensation of such carrier for such transportation or service, either before or after payment, shall be less than the rates, fares, or charges lawfully in effect, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction within the district in which such offense was in whole or in part committed, be subject for each offense to a fine of not more than $5,000.

"'(d) Any water carrier or other person, or any officer, agent, employee, or representative thereof, who shall willfully fail or refuse to make a report to the Commission as required by this part, or to make specific and full, true, and correct answer to any question within thirty days from the time it is lawfully required by the Commission so to do, or to keep accounts, records, and memoranda in the form and manner prescribed by the Commission, or shall willfully falsify, destroy, mutilate, or alter any report, account, record, memorandum, book, correspondence, or other document, required under this part to be kept, or who shall willfully neglect or fail to make full, true, and correct entries in such accounts, records, or memoranda of all facts and transactions as required under this part, or shall willfully keep any accounts, records, or memoranda contrary to the rules, regulations, or orders of the Commission with respect thereto, or shall knowingly and willfully file with the Commission any false report, account, record, or memorandum, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction within the district in which such offense was in whole or in part committed, be subject for each offense to a fine of not more than $5,000. As used in this subsection, the word "keep" shall be construed to mean made, prepared, or compiled, as well as retained.

"'(e) Any special agent, accountant, or examiner of the Commission who knowingly and willfully divulges any fact or information which may come to his knowledge during the course of any examination or inspection made under authority of section 313, except as he may be directed by the Commission or by a court or judge thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or both.

"'(f) It shall be unlawful for any common carrier by water, or any officer, receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or employee of such carrier, or for any other person authorized by such carrier or person to receive information, knowingly and willfully to disclose to or permit to be acquired by any person other than the shipper or consignee, without the consent of such shipper or consignee, any information concerning the nature, kind, quantity, destination, consignee, or routing of any property tendered or delivered to such carrier for transportation subject to this part, which information may be used to the detriment or prejudice of such shipper or consignee, or which may or does improperly disclose his business transactions to a competitor; and it shall also be unlawful for any person to solicit or knowingly and willfully receive any such information which may be or is so used. Any person violating any provisions of this subsection shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction within the district in which such offense was in whole or in part committed shall be subject to a fine of not more than $2,000. Nothing in this part shall be construed to prevent the giving of such information in response to any legal process issued under the authority of any court, or to any officer or agent of the Government of the United States or of any State, Territory, or District thereof, in the exercise of his powers, or to any officer or other duly authorized person seeking such information for the prosecution of persons charged with or suspected of crimes, or to another carrier, or its duly authorized agent, for the purpose of adjusting mutual traffic accounts in the ordinary course of business of such carriers.

"'COLLECTION OF RATES AND CHARGES

"'SEC. 318. No common carrier by water shall deliver or relinquish possession at destination of any freight transported by it until all tariff rates and charges thereon have been paid, except under such rules and regulations as the Commission may from time to time prescribe to govern the settlement of all such rates and charges, including rules and regulations for periodical settlement, and to prevent unjust discrimination or undue preference or prejudice: Provided, That the provisions of this paragraph shall not be construed to prohibit any such carrier from extending credit in connection with rates and charges on freight transported for the United States, for any department, bureau, or agency thereof, or for any State or Territory or political subdivision thereof, or for the District of Columbia. Where such carrier is instructed by a shipper or consignor to deliver property transported by such carrier to a consignee other than the shipper or consignor, such consignee shall not be legally liable for transportation charges in respect of the transportation of such property (beyond those billed against him at the time of delivery for which he is otherwise liable) which may be found to be due after the property has been delivered to him, if the consignee (1) is an agent only and had no beneficial title in the property, and (2) prior to delivery of the property has notified the delivering carrier in writing of the fact of such agency and absence of beneficial title, and, in the case of a shipment reconsigned or diverted to a point other than that specified in the original bill of lading, has notified the delivering carrier in writing of the name and address of the beneficial owner of the property. In such cases the shipper or consignor, or in the case of a shipment so reconsigned or diverted, the beneficial owner shall be liable for such additional charges irrespective of any provisions to the contrary in the bill of lading or in the contract under which the shipment was made or handled. An action for the enforcement of such liability may be begun within two years from the time the cause of action accrues, or before the expiration of six months after final judgment against the carrier in an action against the consignee begun within said period. If the consignee has given to the carrier erroneous information as to who is the beneficial owner, such consignee shall himself be liable for such additional charges, notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this paragraph. An action for the enforcement of such liability may be begun within two years from the time the cause of action accrues, or before the expiration of six months after final judgment against the carrier in an action against the beneficial owner named by the consignee begun within said period. On shipments reconsigned or diverted by an agent who has furnished the carrier with a notice of agency and the proper name and address of the beneficial owner, and where such shipments are refused or abandoned at ultimate destination, the said beneficial owner shall be liable for all legally applicable charges in connection therewith.

"'EMPLOYEES

"'SEC. 319. The Commission is authorized to employ such experts, assistants, special agents, examiners, attorneys, and other employees as in its judgment may be necessary or advisable for the convenience of the public and for the efficient administration of this part. Such examiners shall have power to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence.

"'REPEALS

"'SEC. 320. (a) The Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, and the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, as amended, are hereby repealed insofar as they are inconsistent with any provision of this part and insofar as they provide for the regulation of, or the making of agreements relating to, transportation of persons or property by water in commerce which is within the jurisdiction of the Commission under the provisions of this part; and any other provisions of law are hereby repealed insofar as they are inconsistent with any provision of this part.

"'(b) Nothing in subsection (a) shall be construed to repeal—

"'(1) section 205 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, or any provision of law providing penalties for violations of such section 205;

"'(2) the third sentence of section 2 of the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, as amended, as extended by section 5 of such Act, or any provision of law providing penalties for violations of such section 2;

"'(3) the provisions of the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, insofar as such Act provides for the regulation of persons included within the term "other person subject to this Act", as defined in such Act;

"'(4) sections 27 and 28 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, as amended.

"'(c) Nothing in subsection (a) shall be construed to affect the provisions of section 15 of the Shipping Act, 1916, so as to prevent any water carrier subject to the provisions of this part from entering into any agreement under the provisions of such section 15 with respect to transportation not subject to the provisions of this part in which such carrier may be engaged.

"'(d) Nothing in this part shall be construed to affect any law of navigation, the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, liabilities of vessels and their owners for loss or damage, or laws respecting seamen, or any other maritime law, regulation, or custom not in conflict with the provisions of this part.

"'(e) Subsection (e) of section 3 of the Inland Waterways Corporation Act of June 7, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., title 49, sec. 153 (e)), is hereby repealed as of October 1, 1940: Provided, however, That (1) any certificate of public convenience and necessity granted to any carrier pursuant to the provisions of such subsection (e) shall continue in effect as though issued under the provisions of section 309 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended; and (2) through routes and joint rates, and rules, regulations, and practices relating thereto, put into effect pursuant to the provisions of such subsection (e) shall, after the repeal of such subsection (e), be held and considered to have been put into effect pursuant to the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

"'TRANSFER OF EMPLOYEES, RECORDS, PROPERTY, AND APPROPRIATIONS

"'SEC. 321. (a) Such officers and employees of the United States Maritime Commission as the President shall determine to have been employed in the administration of the provisions of law repealed by section 320, and whose retention by the United States Maritime Commission is not necessary, in the opinion of the President, for the performance of other duties, are transferred to the Interstate Commerce Commission upon such date or dates as the President shall specify by Executive order. Such transfer of such personnel shall be without reduction in classification or compensation, except that this requirement shall not operate after the end of the fiscal year during which such transfer is made to prevent the adjustment of classification or compensation to conform to the duties to which such transferred personnel may be assigned.

"'(b) All files, reports, records, tariff schedules, property (including office furniture and equipment), contracts, agreements, documents, or papers kept or used by, made to, or filed with the United States Maritime Commission under or in the administration of any provision of law repealed by this part, are hereby transferred to the jurisdiction and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and may be used for such purposes as the Interstate Commerce Commission may deem necessary in the administration of this part; except that in the case of files, reports, records, tariff schedules, contracts, agreements, documents, or papers, the retention of which is necessary for purposes of the administration by the United States Maritime Commission of matters within its jurisdiction, the furnishing to the Interstate Commerce Commission of copies thereof shall constitute sufficient compliance with the provisions of this subsection.

"'(c) All appropriations and unexpended balances of appropriations available for expenditure by the United States Maritime Commission in the administration of any provision of law repealed by this part shall be available for expenditure by the Interstate Commerce Commission for any objects of expenditure authorized by this part, in the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, without regard to the requirement of apportionment under the Anti-Deficiency Act of February 27, 1906.

"'EXISTING ORDERS, RULES, TARIFFS, AND SO FORTH; PENDING MATTERS

"'SEC. 322. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 320, or any other provision of this part, all orders, rules, regulations, permits, tariffs (including rates, fares, charges, classifications, rules, and regulations relating thereto), contracts, or agreements, to the extent that they were issued, authorized, approved, entered into, or filed under any provision of law repealed by this part, and are still in effect, shall continue in force and effect according to the terms thereof as though this part had not been enacted, except that the Commission may modify, set aside, or rescind any such order, rule, regulation, permit, tariff, contract, or agreement to the extent that it finds the same to be in violation of any provision of this part or inconsistent with the national transportation policy declared in this Act.

"'(b) Any proceeding, hearing, or investigation commenced or pending before the United States Maritime Commission at the time this section takes effect, to the extent that it relates to the administration of any provision of law repealed by this part, shall be continued or otherwise acted upon by the Commission as though such proceeding, hearing, or investigation had been instituted under the provisions of this part.

"'(c) Any pending judicial proceeding arising under any provision of law repealed by the provisions of this part shall be continued, heard, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect as if this part had not been enacted; except that in the case of any such proceeding to which the United States Maritime Commission is a party, the court, upon motion or supplemental petition, may direct that the Commission be substituted for the United States Maritime Commission as a party to the proceeding or made an additional party thereto.

"'SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

"'SEC. 323. If any provision of this part or the application thereof to any person, or commerce, or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of the part and the application of such provision to other persons, or commerce, or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.'

"TIME EFFECTIVE

"SEC. 202. Part III of the Interstate Commerce Act shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act, except that sections 304 (c), 305 to 308, inclusive, 309 (a) and (f), 313 to 318, inclusive, 320, 321, and 322 shall take effect on the 1st day of January 1941: Provided, however, That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, if found by it necessary or desirable in the public interest, by general or special order postpone the taking effect of any of the provisions above enumerated to such time, but not beyond the 1st day of April 1942, as the Commission shall prescribe.

"TITLE III—MISCELLANEOUS

"PART I—INVESTIGATION OF VARIOUS MODES OF TRANSPORTATION

"SEC. 301. There is hereby established a board of investigation and research (hereinafter referred to as the 'Board') to be composed of three members who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the period of the existence of the Board as hereinafter provided. Not more than two members of said Board shall be members of the same political party. The President shall designate the member to act as Chairman of the Board and the Board may elect another of its members as Vice Chairman, who shall act as Chairman in the case of absence or incapacity of the Chairman. A majority of the Board shall constitute a quorum and the powers conferred upon the Board by this section may be exercised by a majority vote of its members. A vacancy on the Board shall not affect the powers of the remaining members to execute the functions of the Board, and shall be filled in the same manner as the original selection. The members of the Board shall receive compensation at the rate of $10,000 per annum, and in addition shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the exercise of the functions vested in the Board. Carriers by railroad, motor carriers, and water carriers shall be permitted to provide free transportation and other carrier service to the Board and its employees while traveling on official business, regardless of any provisions in the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, restricting such carriers from furnishing free transportation or service.

"SEC. 302. (a) It shall be the duty of the Board to investigate—

"(1) the relative economy and fitness of carriers by railroad, motor carriers, and water carriers for transportation service, or any particular classes or descriptions thereof, with the view of determining the service for which each type of carrier is especially fitted or unfitted; the methods by which each type can and should be developed so that there may be provided a national transportation system adequate to meet the needs of the commerce of the United States, of the Postal Service and of the national defense;

"(2) the extent to which right-of-way or other transportation facilities and special services have been or are provided from public funds for the use, within the territorial limits of the continental United States, of each of the three types of carriers without adequate compensation, direct or indirect, therefor, and the extent to which such carriers have been or are aided by donations of public property, payments from public funds in excess of adequate compensation for services rendered in return therefor, or extensions of Government credit; and

"(3) the extent to which taxes are imposed upon such carriers by the United States, and the several States, and by other agencies of government, including county, municipal, district, and local agencies.

"(b) The Board is further authorized, in its discretion, to investigate or consider any other matter relating to rail carriers, motor carriers, or water carriers, which it may deem important to investigate for the improvement of transportation conditions and to effectuate the national transportation policy declared in the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

"SEC. 303. The Board is authorized to employ, without regard to the civil service laws or the Classification Act, 1923, as amended, a secretary who shall receive compensation at the rate of $7,500 per annum and a general counsel who shall receive compensation at the rate of $9,000 per annum; and to employ, without regard to the civil service laws, a clerk to each member of the Board. The Board is also authorized to employ such experts, assistants, special agents, examiners, attorneys, and other employees as in its judgment may be necessary for the performance of its duties, and is authorized to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the various departments and agencies of the Government to the extent that such services, information, facilities, and personnel, in the opinion of such departments and agencies, can be furnished without undue interference with the performance of the work and duties of such departments and agencies.

"SEC. 304. (a) The Board and its agents shall at all times have access to all accounts, records, and memoranda of the carriers and to their properties, and it shall be the duty of the carriers to furnish the Board or its agents, such information and reports as it may desire in investigating any matter within the scope of its duties.

"(b) For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this part the Board may seek information from such sources and conduct its investigations in such manner as it deems advisable in the interest of a correct ascertainment of the facts, and the Board and its examiners shall be entitled to exercise the same powers with respect to conducting hearings and requiring the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, contracts, agreements, or other records and documents as are conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission and its examiners by sections 17 and 12 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, and the provisions of paragraphs (3), (4), and (7) of section 12 of such Act shall be applicable to all persons summoned by subpena or otherwise to attend and testify or to produce books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, contracts, agreements, or other records and documents before the Board.

"SEC. 305. On or before May 1, 1941, the Board shall transmit to the President and to the Congress preliminary reports of the studies and investigations carried on by it, together with such findings and recommendations as it is by that time prepared to make. In addition to such preliminary reports the Board shall submit to the President and to the Congress an annual report, a final report, and such other reports as it may deem necessary, of the studies and investigations carried out by it pursuant to the provisions of this section, together with its findings and recommendations based thereon.

"SEC. 306. This part shall cease to have effect at the end of two years after its enactment unless extended by a proclamation of the President for an additional period which shall not exceed two years.

"PART II—RATES ON GOVERNMENT TRAFFIC

"GOVERNMENT TO PAY FULL RATES

"SEC. 321. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, but subject to the provisions of sections 1 (7) and 22 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, the full applicable commercial rates, fares, or charges shall be paid for transportation by any common carrier subject to such Act of any persons or property for the United States, or on its behalf, except that the foregoing provision shall not apply to the transportation of military or naval property of the United States moving for military or naval and not for civil use or to the transportation of members of the military or naval forces of the United States (or of property of such members) when such members are traveling on official duty; and the rate determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission as reasonable therefor shall be paid for the transportation by railroad of the United States mail: Provided, however, That any carrier by railroad and the United States may enter into contracts for the transportation of the United States mail for less than such rate: Provided further, That section 3709, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., 1934 edition, title 41, sec. 5), shall not hereafter be construed as requiring advertising for bids in connection with the procurement of transportation services when the services required can be procured from any common carrier lawfully operating in the territory where such services are to be performed.

"(b) If any carrier by railroad furnishing such transportation, or any predecessor in interest, shall have received a grant of lands from the United States to aid in the construction of any part of the railroad operated by it, the provisions of law with respect to compensation for such transportation shall continue to apply to such transportation as though subsection (a) of this section had not been enacted until such carrier shall file with the Secretary of the Interior, in the form and manner prescribed by him, a release of any claim it may have against the United States to lands, interests in lands, compensation, or reimbursement on account of lands or interests in lands which have been granted, claimed to have been granted, or which it is claimed should have been granted to such carrier or any such predecessor in interest under any grant to such carrier or such predecessor in interest as aforesaid. Such release must be filed within one year from the date of the enactment of this Act. Nothing in this section shall be construed as requiring any such carrier to recovery to the United States lands which have been heretofore patented or certified to it, or to prevent the issuance of patents confirming the title to such lands as the Secretary of the Interior shall find have been heretofore sold by any such carrier to an innocent purchaser for value or as preventing the issuance of patents to lands listed or selected by such carrier, which listing or selection has heretofore been duly and finally approved by the Secretary of the Interior to the extent that the issuance of such patents may be authorized by law.

"DEDUCTION OF OVERPAYMENTS

"SEC. 322. Payment for transportation of the United States mail and of persons or property for or on behalf of the United States by any common carrier subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, or the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, shall be made upon presentation of bills therefor, prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, but the right is hereby reserved to the United States Government to deduct the amount of any overpayment to any such carrier from any amount subsequently found to be due such carrier.

"PART III—AMENDMENTS TO RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION ACT

"SEC. 331. (a) Section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is amended by amending that portion of the third sentence, of the third paragraph, which precedes the last proviso in such sentence to read as follows: 'Within the foregoing limitations of this section, the Corporation, notwithstanding any limitation of law as to maturity, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, including approval of the price to be paid, may, to aid in the financing, reorganization, consolidation, maintenance, or construction thereof, purchase for itself, or for account of a railroad obligated thereon, the obligations of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, or of receivers or trustees thereof, including equipment trust certificates, or guarantee the payment of the principal of, and/or interest on, such obligations, including equipment trust certificates, or, when, in the opinion of the Corporation, funds are not available on reasonable terms through private channels, make loans, upon full and adequate security, to such railroads or to receivers or trustees thereof for the purposes aforesaid: Provided, That in the case of loans to or the purchase or guarantee of obligations, including equipment trust certificates, of railroads not in receivership or trusteeship, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, in connection with its approval thereof, also certify that such railroad, on the basis of present and prospective earnings, may reasonably be expected to meet its fixed charges, without a reduction thereof through judicial reorganization, except that such certificate shall not be required in case of such loans, purchases, or guaranties made for the maintenance of, or purchase of equipment for, such railroads: Provided, further, That for the purpose of determining the general funds of the Corporation available for further loans or commitments, such guaranties shall, to the extent of the principal amount of the obligations guaranteed, be interpreted as loans or commitments for loans: And provided further, That the total amount of loans and commitments to railroads, receivers, and trustees, and purchases and guaranties of obligations of railroads, under this paragraph, as amended, shall not exceed at any one time $500,000,000, in addition to loans and commitments made prior to January 31, 1935, and renewals of loans and commitments so made:'.

"(b) Such section 5, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end of the third paragraph thereof the following sentence: 'The title of any owner, whether as trustee or otherwise, to any property leased or conditionally sold to a railroad, or a receiver or trustee thereof, which the Corporation has financed, or in the financing of which the Corporation has aided, any right of such owner to take possession of such property in compliance with the provisions of any such lease or conditional sales contract, and the title of any owner of a collateral note evidencing a loan from the Corporation to a railroad not now in receivership or involved in proceedings under section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act, or a receiver or trustee thereof, and the right of any such owner to acquire title to the collateral securing such note, free and clear of any equity of redemption, in compliance with the contract of pledge, and thereafter to deal with the same as the absolute owner thereof, shall not be affected, restricted, or restrained by or pursuant to the provisions of the Act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An Act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", as amended, or by or pursuant to any other provision of law applicable to any proceedings thereunder.'

"(c) The first sentence of section 3 of the Act approved January 31, 1935 (49 Stat., ch. 2, pp. 1–2), is hereby amended by striking out 'January 31, 1945' and inserting in lieu thereof 'January 31, 1955'."

And the House agree to the same.

That the title of the bill be amended to read as follows: "An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, so as to provide for unified regulation of carriers by railroad, motor vehicle, and water, and for other purposes."

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2009), to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House amendment strikes out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause. The Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, with an amendment which is a substitute for both the Senate bill and the House amendment. The differences between the House amendment and the substitute agreed to in conference are noted in the following statement, except for incidental changes made necessary by reason of agreements reached by the conferees, minor clarifying changes, and changes moving forward certain dates due to the lapse of time since the conference committee submitted its first report.

Section 2 (b). Definition of control

This subsection inserts in paragraph (3) of section 1 of the Interstate Commerce Act a definition of "control" which will apply in certain specified sections of the act where that term is used in referring to a relationship between any person or persons and another person or persons. Since the term "person" is defined to include artificial as well as natural persons, the definition of control will cover relationships between corporations, companies, associations, etc.

The definition of control was made to apply only in the specified sections because it was thought undesirable to make any change in the interpretation of present law in certain other provisions of the act, notably section 1 (1) (a) and section 15 (4). The application of this definition of control will in most cases be in connection with the use in the sections to which it applies of the phrase "controlling, controlled by, or under common control with" a carrier. This phrase has been used because it has recently had the benefit of interpretation by the Supreme Court in the case of Rochester Telephone Corp. v. United States (307 U. S. 125, decided April 17, 1939).

Regulation of forwarding carriers

Section 2 of the House amendment amended section 1 (3) of the Interstate Commerce Act so as to bring forwarding carriers under regulation as common carriers subject to Part I of the Interstate Commerce Act. The Senate bill did not provide for regulation of forwarding carriers.

The conference substitute does not provide for the regulation of forwarding carriers.

The conferees were friendly to the proposal of providing legislation for such regulation, but the legislative situation at the present time makes it inadvisable to include such provisions in the present bill. On June 24, 1940, the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce concluded hearings on Senate Resolution 146, which authorized an investigation and study of freight forwarders. Subsequently bills providing for regulation of freight forwarders were introduced in the Senate and House and are now subject to report from the appropriate committees to the Senate and House, respectively.

Section 2 (d). Exchange of services between carriers and telephone, telegraph, and cable companies

The conference substitute in section 2 (d) amends section 1 (5) of the Interstate Commerce Act which contains a proviso to the effect that nothing in part I shall be construed to prevent telephone, telegraph, and cable companies from entering into contracts with common carriers for the exchange of service. The amendment strikes out the proviso and adds a separate provision reading as follows:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any common carrier subject to this act from entering into or operating under any contract with any telephone, telegraph, or cable company for the exchange of their services."

This change was made in consideration of the fact that there is a provision in section 201 (b) of the Communications Act of 1934 to the effect that nothing in that act or in any other provision of law shall be construed to prevent a common carrier subject to that act from entering into any contract with any common carrier not subject thereto for exchanges of services, if the Federal Communications Commission is of the opinion that such contract is not contrary to the public interest.

Section 3 (a), (b) and (c). Transportation, free or at reduced rates

The House amendment in section 4 amended the free-pass and free-transportation provision of present law (sec. 1 (7), Interstate Commerce Act) to permit free transportation of certain additional classes of persons. The conference substitute in section 3 eliminates "agents" from the class of persons to whom free transportation may be given under sections 1 (7) and 22 of the Interstate Commerce Act. The substitute also includes a provision from the Senate bill extending the privilege of free transportation to additional classes of Post Office Department employees.

Section 3 (d) and (e). Repeal of certain provisions in section 22 of the Interstate Commerce Act

The conference substitute contains in section 3 (d) provisions repealing the last sentence of paragraph (1) of section 22 of the Interstate Commerce Act, relating to the authority of carriers by railroad to grant reduced rates with the objective of improving

Nation-wide housing standards and providing employment and stimulating industry.

Section 3 (e) repeals paragraphs (2) and (3) of such section 22 which authorizes the Commission to require carriers by railroad to issue interchangeable mileage or scrip coupon tickets. This latter provision is repealed because it is not necessary in view of the provisions of present law in section 22 (1) which authorizes the issuance of interchangeable 5,000-mile tickets.

Section 4 (a). Car service; protective service

Section 5 of the House amendment amended section 1 (14) of the Interstate Commerce Act so as to make it clear that the Commission's jurisdiction with respect to car service and the compensation to be paid for the use of any car now owned by the carrier using it includes a car of private as well as of carrier ownership. The conference substitute in section 4 (a) retains this change in present law and also gives the Commission increased authority as to the terms of any contract, agreement, or arrangement for the use of any locomotive, car, or other vehicle. The conference substitute adds a new subparagraph (b) to section 1 (14) requiring approval of the Commission in the case of contracts for the furnishing to common carriers by railroad, or to express companies, of protective service against heat or cold.

Section 4 (b). Bribery in car service matters

The conference substitute in section 4 (b), which is new, amends section 1 (17) of the present law so as to prohibit any person from giving a bribe to any person acting for or employed by any carrier by railroad with intent to influence his decision or action with respect to car service and prohibits any person acting for or employed by such carrier to receive any bribe in connection with car service. It provides a penalty of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for a term of not exceeding 2 years, or both.

Section 4 (c). Spur, industrial, team, switching, or side tracks

Section 1 (18) of the present law provides for the issuance of a certificate of public convenience and necessity to a carrier by railroad which undertakes to extend its line or to construct a new line, etc. The conference substitute, in section 4 (c), adds a new sentence providing that nothing in this paragraph or in section 5 shall be construed to prohibit the making of contracts between carriers by railroad, without the approval of the Commission, for the joint ownership or joint use of spur, industrial, team, switching, or side tracks.

Section 5 (a). Undue preference and undue prejudice

Section 6 of the House amendment amended section 3 (1) of the Interstate Commerce Act, which makes it unlawful for any common carrier subject to part I to give any undue preference, or cause undue prejudice, to any person, locality, port, port district, gateway, or transit point, or to any particular description of traffic. The House amendment added the words "region, district, territory" to the list of places and localities.

The conference substitute in section 5 retains this amendment and adds a proviso that this paragraph shall not be construed to apply to discrimination, prejudice, or disadvantage to the traffic of any other carrier of whatever description.

A similar proviso is contained in section 216 (d) of part II with respect to common carriers by motor vehicle, and in section 305 (c) of new part III with respect to common carriers by water.

Section 5 (a). Export rates on agricultural commodities

Section 6 of the House amendment included an amendment, adopted on the floor of the House (the Jones amendment) which added a new paragraph to section 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as follows:

"(1a) It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress that shippers of wheat, cotton, and all other farm commodities for export should have substantially the same advantage of reduced rates, as compared to shippers of such commodities not for export, that are in effect in the case of shipment of industrial products for export as compared with shipment of industrial products not for export, and the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to institute such investigations, to conduct such hearings, and to issue orders making such revision of rates as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out such policy."

There was no similar provision in the Senate bill.

The substitute amendment for the Jones amendment, agreed upon by the conferees, provides for the benefits contemplated by the original amendment and removes the uncertainties involved in the original language. The substitute also recognizes that agricultural and industrial products should be granted export rates on the same principles and without unjust discrimination. The substitute also provides for investigations, hearings, and orders that may be necessary to correct any such discriminations that might be found to exist in the administering of export rates.

The substitute amendment, which the conferees believe fully accomplishes the purposes of the original amendment, reads as follows:

"(1a) It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress that shippers of wheat, cotton, and all other farm commodities for export shall be granted export rates on the same principles as are applicable in the case of rates on industrial products for export. The Commission is hereby directed, on its own initiative or on application by interested persons, to make such investigations, and conduct such hearings, and, after appropriate proceedings, to issue such orders, as may be necessary to carry out such policy."

Section 5 (c) and (d). Liability for legally applicable charges

The conference substitute in a new provision in section 5 (c) amends paragraph (2) of section 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act by adding two sentences providing that in case of a shipment transported by a carrier by railroad which has been reconsigned or diverted by an agent who has furnished the carrier in the reconsignment or diversion order with a notice of agency and the proper name and address of the beneficial owner, and where shipment is refused or abandoned at ultimate destination, the beneficial owner shall be liable for all legally applicable charges. If the reconsignor or diverter, however, has given erroneous information as to who the beneficial owner is, such reconsignor or diverter shall himself be liable for such charges.

The House amendment in section 6 thereof amended section 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act by adding a new paragraph (3) which relieved from liability for transportation charges a consignor (who is also the consignee named in the bill of lading) who, prior to the time of delivery, notified in writing a delivering carrier by railroad or by express (a) to deliver such property at destination to another party, (b) that such party was the beneficial owner, and (c) that delivery was to be made to such party only upon payment of all transportation charges in respect of the transportation of such property, and delivery was made by the carrier to such party without such payment. The party to whom delivery was so made (if such party was the beneficial owner) was made liable for such transportation charges and for any additional charges which might be found to be due after delivery of the property. If the consignor, however, gave the delivering carrier erroneous information as to who the beneficial owner was, such consignor was made liable for such transportation charges.

The conference substitute in section 5 (d) retains these provisions except that in making liable for charges the party to whom delivery is made it omits the phrase "(if such party is the beneficial owner)" and, in addition, provides that if the party to whom delivery is made has, prior to such delivery, notified in writing the delivering carrier that he is not the beneficial owner of the property and has given the delivering carrier in writing the name and address of such beneficial owner, such party shall not be liable for any additional charges which may be found to be due after delivery of the property; but if the party to whom delivery is made has given to the carrier erroneous information as to the beneficial owner, such party shall nevertheless be liable for such additional charges.

Section 5 (f). Joint use of terminal facilities

The conference substitute, in section 5 (f), amends section 3 (4) of the Interstate Commerce Act which authorizes the Commission to require, in the public interest, the use of the terminal facilities of a carrier subject to part I by another carrier or carriers at a just and reasonable compensation. The amendment limits the provisions of this section so as to make them apply only to common carriers by railroad.

Section 6. Long-and-short-haul provision

The conference substitute, in section 6, amends section 4 (1) of the Interstate Commerce Act.

The effect of the amendment is to extend the provisions of section 4 (1), which contains the long-and-short-haul provision and the aggregate-of-intermediate-rates provision, so that they will apply to common carriers by water subject to part III as well as to common carriers subject to part I. It repeals the "equidistant" clause, which reads as follows:

"And if a circuitous rail line or route is, because of such circuity, granted authority to meet the charges of a more direct line or route to or from competitive points and to maintain higher charges to or from intermediate points on its line, the authority shall not include intermediate points as to which the haul of the petitioning line or route is not longer than that of the direct line or route between the competitive points."

A new proviso is added, as follows:

"And provided further, That tariffs proposing rates subject to the provisions of this paragraph may be filed when application is made to the Commission under the provisions hereof, and in the event such application is approved, the Commission shall permit such tariffs to become effective upon 1 day's notice."

Section 7. Consolidations, mergers, acquisitions of control, etc.

The House amendment in section 8 and the Senate bill in section 49 provided for the revision of the provisions of section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act relating to consolidations, mergers, acquisitions of control, etc., making such revised section apply to all types of carriers subject, and proposed to be made subject, to the Interstate Commerce Act. As a necessary incident, the repeal of section 213 (relating to unifications, etc., in case of motor carriers) was provided for.

The conference substitute, in section 7, includes the provisions of the House amendment with certain revisions, and in section 21 (e) repeals section 213 of the Interstate Commerce Act. Aside from clarifying changes, these revisions are as follows:

1. Paragraph (2) is changed by adding the words "or otherwise" in several places, so that acquisitions of control by methods other than through ownership of stock is authorized with Commission approval.

2. Paragraph (2) is made to cover a consolidation or merger of franchises.

3. Specific authority is granted to acquire trackage rights, with Commission approval. This provision was taken from the Senate bill.

4. The House amendment included a proviso (the Harrington amendment) prohibiting approval of any transaction which would result in unemployment or displacement of employees, or in the impairment of their employment rights. There was no similar provision in the Senate bill. In lieu of this proviso, the following provision has been included in the conference substitute:

"(f) As a condition of its approval, under this paragraph (2), of any transaction involving a carrier or carriers by railroad subject to the provisions of this part, the Commission shall require a fair and equitable arrangement to protect the interests of the railroad employees affected. In its order of approval the Commission shall include terms and conditions providing that during the period of 4 years from the effective date of such order such transaction will not result in employees of the carrier or carriers by railroad affected by such order being in a worse position with respect to their employment, except that the protection afforded to any employee pursuant to this sentence shall not be required to continue for a longer period, following the effective date of such order, than the period during which such employee was in the employ of such carrier or carriers prior to the effective date of such order. Notwithstanding any other provisions of this act, an agreement pertaining to the protection of the interests of said employees may hereafter be entered into by any carrier or carriers by railroad and the duly authorized representative or representatives of its or their employees."

The substitute proposal for the Harrington amendment, as recommended to the conferees by instruction of the House, provided in substance that in case of consolidations and other unifications involving carriers by railroads, the Commission should in its order of approval require fair and equitable arrangements to protect the interests of the railroad employees affected. This provision has been retained in the substitute amendment agreed upon in conference.

The instruction of the House also made the provisions of the amendment applicable to the case where another means of transportation was substituted for rail transportation proposed to be abandoned. This provision is omitted from the substitute adopted in conference. A consideration of the application of this provision was, in the judgment of the conferees, found to be impracticable of proper administration.

The conference agreement on the Harrington amendment includes a provision of the instruction which provides that the order of approval shall include terms and conditions providing that the transaction shall not result in the employees being in a worse position with respect to their employment. The conference agreement, however, qualifies this provision by confining its operation to a period of 4 years from the effective date of the order approving the transaction and providing further that the protection afforded to an employee shall not be required to continue for a longer period following the effective date of the order than the period for which such employee was in the employ of an affected carrier prior to the effective date of the order.

In other words, the Harrington amendment made all employees of the affected carriers equal beneficiaries of its provisions regardless of the length of time they may have been employed prior to a consolidation. It also required the carrier to maintain the benefits of its provisions indefinitely and without any specified limitation by time or otherwise. Under the terms of the conference agreement the benefits to employees will be required to be paid for not longer than 4 years after the consolidation, and in no case for longer than the service of the employee for the affected carriers prior to the effective date of the order authorizing the consolidation.

5. The definitions of "person" and "control" have been eliminated as unnecessary because of the new definitions of "person" and "control" applying generally to part I.

6. Forwarding carriers are not included among the carriers to which the revised section 5 will apply.

7. The so-called Panama Canal Act provisions (pars. 19, 20, and 21 of sec. 5 of the present law) have been modified for the purpose of clarifying their relation to the other provisions of the section and of making more certain the authority of the Commission, in connection with which there has apparently been doubt, with respect to the installation of new service.

Section 8 (a). Authority with respect to schedules

The conference substitute, in section 8 (a), amends section 6 (6) of the Interstate Commerce Act so as to clarify the Commission's authority with respect to the filing, publication, posting, and rejection of schedules required to be filed under such section 6.

Section 8 (b). Repeal of paragraphs (11) and (12) of section 6

The conference substitute, in section 8 (b), repeals paragraphs (11) and (12) of section 6 of the Interstate Commerce Act, which require part I carriers to furnish, upon written request, a statement of the rate applicable to a described shipment, and require rail carriers to post in every freight station the name of a resident agent. These paragraphs are considered to be obsolete.

Section 8 (c) and (d). Arrangements with water carriers operating to foreign ports

The conference substitute in section 8 (c) and (d) amends section 6 (13) of the Interstate Commerce Act which provides that if any carrier by railroad enters into an arrangement with any water carrier operating from a port in the United States to a foreign country for handling through business between interior points of the United States and such foreign country, the Commission may require such rail carrier to enter into similar arrangements with any and all other lines of steamships operating from the said port to the same foreign country.

The amendment repeals the present paragraph (d) and embodies these provisions, with amendments, in a new paragraph (12) of such section 6, applicable to any common carrier subject to the act which enters into such arrangements.

Section 9 (a). Authority of Commission to inquire into the management of persons controlling carriers

Section 12 (1) of the present act grants the Commission authority to inquire into the management of the business of all common carriers subject to part I. The conference substitute in section 9 (a) amends such section 12 (1) by granting the Commission power also to inquire into and report on the management of the business of persons controlling, controlled by, or under a common control with, such carriers to the extent that the business of such persons is related to the management of the business of one or more such carriers. The Commission is authorized to obtain from such persons such information as the Commission deems necessary to carry out the provisions of part I; and to transmit to Congress from time to time such recommendations, including recommendations as to additional legislation, as the Commission considers necessary.

The same power is granted the Commission in amended section 204 (a) (7) of part II with respect to such persons in relation to motor carriers and in section 304 (b) of new part III in relation to water carriers.

Section 10 (b). Limitation on "short hauling" a rail carrier

Section 15 (4) of the Interstate Commerce Act imposes a restriction upon the authority of the Commission to establish through routes over railroad lines. The Commission is prohibited from requiring "any carrier by railroad, without its consent, to embrace in such route substantially less than the entire length of its railroad and of any intermediate railroad operated in conjunction and under a common management or control therewith, which lies between the termini of such proposed through route." There are four exceptions, or conditions, under which the restriction does not apply. First, where such inclusion of lines would make the through route unreasonably long as compared with another practicable through route which could otherwise be established; second, where one of the carriers is a water line; third, where there is involved a matter arising under the provisions of section 3 which, among other things, relate to undue preference of, or undue prejudice to, persons, localities, or traffic, discriminations in the interchange of traffic, and requirements by the Commission with respect to common use of terminals; and fourth, where the establishment of temporary through routes are necessary or desirable in the public interest in time of shortage of equipment, congestion of traffic, or other emergency declared by the Commission.

The House amendment made no change in the short-haul provisions of section 15 (4) and the exceptions thereto. The conference substitute in section 10 (b) retains them and includes another exception by providing that the restriction against short hauling a rail carrier shall not apply where the Commission finds that the through route proposed to be established is needed in order to provide adequate and more efficient or more economic transportation. The Commission in the exercise of this additional authority is directed to give reasonable preference in any particular case to the carrier by railroad which originates the traffic, so far as is consistent with the public interest and subject to the limitations with respect to unreasonably long routes and the necessity of providing adequate and more efficient or more economic transportation. The Commission is prohibited from establishing any through route and joint rates applicable thereto for the purpose of assisting any carrier that would participate therein to meet its financial needs.

A further amendment is made to the through-routes provision, by providing in section 15 (3) of the Interstate Commerce Act a provision that if any tariff or schedule canceling any through route or joint rate, fare, charge, or classification, without the consent of all carriers parties thereto or authorization by the Commission, is suspended by the Commission for investigation, the burden of proof shall be upon the carrier or carriers proposing such cancelation to show that it is consistent with the public interest, without regard to the short-haul provisions of section 15 (4).

Section 10 (c). Burden of proof on change of rates

The conference substitute in section 10 (c) amends section 15 (7) of the Interstate Commerce Act. The effect of the amendment is to place the burden of proof upon a carrier subject to part I to show that any proposed change made by it in a rate, fare, charge, classification, rule, regulation, or practice is just and reasonable, at any hearing involving such change. The provision in existing law places this burden upon the carrier only where the carrier proposes to increase a rate, fare, or charge.

A similar change is made in section 216 (g) with respect to a proposed change made by a common carrier by motor vehicle in its rate, fare, charge, classification, or rule, regulation, or practice; in section 218 (c) with respect to any proposed new rate or any reduced charge made by a contract carrier by motor vehicle; and in section 307 (g) and (i) of new part III with respect to carriers by water.

Section 10 (d). Allowances

Section 15 (13) of the Interstate Commerce Act authorizes carriers subject to part I to pay allowances to the owner of property transported for any service or instrumentality furnished by such owner in connection with the transportation. The conference substitute in section 10 (d) provides that such charge and allowance shall be published in tariffs or schedules filed in the manner provided in the Interstate Commerce Act.

The conference substitute in section 225 of part II adds a similar provision with respect to charges and allowances paid by motor carriers, and in section 314 of part III with respect to charges and allowances paid by water carriers.

Section 10 (e). Rule of rate making for rail carriers

The conference substitute in section 10 (e) amends paragraph 2 of section 15a of the Interstate Commerce Act to read as follows, inserting the words "by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed":

"(2) In the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates the Commission shall give due consideration, among other factors, to the effect of rates on the movement of traffic by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed; to the need, in the public interest, of adequate and efficient railway transportation service at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service; and to the need of revenues sufficient to enable the carriers, under honest, economical, and efficient management, to provide such service."

Section 11 (b). Service of notice

The conference substitute in section 11 (b) amends section 16 (5) of the Interstate Commerce Act, which relates to the service of orders upon the designated agent in Washington of a carrier subject to part I, by providing that in proceedings before the Commission involving the lawfulness of rates, fares, charges, classifications, or practices, service of notice upon an attorney in fact of a carrier who has filed a tariff or schedule in behalf of such carrier shall be deemed sufficient service upon the carrier, except where the carrier has designated an agent in Washington upon whom service of notices and processes may be made.

Section 12. Commission procedure

Section 13 of the House amendment rewrote section 17 of the Interstate Commerce Act which deals with the administrative disposition of matters coming within the Commission's jurisdiction. The revision included matter in sections 204 (e) and 205 (a) which contained provisions dealing with procedural matters under part II of the Interstate Commerce Act relating to motor-carrier proceedings. Such sections 204 (e) and 205 (a) were repealed. Among other things, the revised section 17 provided for the assignment of work or functions to an individual commissioner, an examiner, or board of examiners.

The provisions of this section of the House bill are retained in the conference substitute in section 12, but modifications are made therein, the more important of which are as follows:

1. The Commission may not, under the rewritten section, assign work or functions to an individual examiner, except to the extent that such assignment is already permitted under part II of the Interstate Commerce Act.

2. Instead of providing for the assignment of work or functions to boards of examiners, the rewritten section provides for assignment thereof to boards of employees. The employees who are eligible to serve are examiners, directors, or assistant directors of bureaus, chiefs of sections, and attorneys.

3. The secretary to the Commission is given authority to administer oaths and sign subpenas.

4. A new paragraph (9) is included providing that orders of a division, an individual Commissioner, or a board shall be subject to judicial review, as in the case of full Commission orders, after an application for rehearing has been made and acted upon.

5. The rewritten section includes a provision taken from the Senate bill authorizing the Commission to promulgate regulations relating to admission to practice before it and authorizing the Commission to impose a reasonable fee in connection with such admission, such fees to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States.

Section 13 (a). Accounts, records, and reports

The conference substitute amends section 20 of the Interstate Commerce Act which relates to accounts, records, reports, etc., of carriers subject to part I. The principal change is that which gives the Commission or its agents authority to inspect and copy accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents of any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with any such carrier, as the Commission deems relevant to such person's relation to or transactions with such carriers. The provision in the present law that the Commission may require annual, periodical, or special reports from the owners of railroads and prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made is amended so as to make such provisions apply to a lessor, which is defined to mean a person owning a railroad, a water line, or a pipe line, leased to and operated by such common carrier. The provision in present law which authorizes the Commission to require from such carriers specific answers to questions upon which the Commission may need information is amended by providing that the Commission may require from such carriers and lessors specific and full, true, and correct answers to such questions. Certain other changes are made with respect to the matter to be contained in annual reports and the time within which annual reports shall be filed with the Commission.

An additional provision is added which authorizes the Commission or its agents to inspect and copy the accounts, books, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents of persons which furnish cars or protective service against heat or cold to any carrier by railroad or express company. This authority is limited to accounts, etc., which pertain or relate to the cars or protective service so furnished. The Commission may prescribe the forms of accounts, records, and memoranda which it is authorized by this paragraph to inspect and copy and to require the persons furnishing such cars or service to submit such reports and specific and full, true, and correct answers to such questions relative to such cars or service as the Commission deems necessary. Certain other changes of lesser importance are included in the amended section.

Penalties are provided for violations of the new requirements included in the amended section.

The conference substitute in section 13 (a) amends paragraph (8) of section 20 of the Interstate Commerce Act, which provides a penalty in the case of an examiner who divulges any information which may come to his knowledge during the course of examination of accounts, records, etc., by providing specifically that the offense shall be a misdemeanor and reducing the maximum penalty now provided by law from $5,000 to $500 and from 2 years' imprisonment to 6 months' imprisonment.

Section 13 (b). Liability for loss and damage

The conference substitute amends section 20 (11) of the Interstate Commerce Act, which provides that any receiving or delivering carrier subject to part I shall be liable (except as provided in the paragraph) for the full actual loss or damage to property transported. The paragraph contains a proviso to the effect that if the loss or damage occurs while the property is in the custody of a carrier by water the liability of the carriers concerned shall be determined by the laws and regulations applicable to transportation by water. The conference substitute in section 13 (b) amends the proviso to read as follows:

"Provided, That if the loss, damage, or injury occurs while the property is in the custody of a common carrier by water the liability of such carrier shall be determined by the bill of lading of the carrier by water and by and under the laws and regulations applicable to transportation by water, and the liability of the initial or delivering carrier shall be the same as that of such carrier by water."

Section 14 (a). Repeal of section 25 relating to water carriers in foreign commerce

The conference substitute in section 14 (a) repeals section 25 of the Interstate Commerce Act, which requires common carriers by water in foreign commerce to file with the Commission schedules of sailings to foreign destinations, and, upon application of any shipper or carrier by railroad, to reserve space in its vessels at a specific rate for the quantity of cargo offered when such shipper delivers the shipment on a through bill of lading to a carrier by railroad at places designated by the Commission.

The retention of this provision in the law was deemed unnecessary.

Section 17 (b). Transportation by motor vehicle in terminal areas

Section 18 of the House amendment amended the definition of common carrier by motor vehicle and of contract carrier by motor vehicle, contained in section 203 of the Interstate Commerce Act. These definitions, as rewritten, provided that in case of transfer, collection, or delivery services by motor vehicle within terminal areas, performed by rail carriers or water carriers, and incidental to transportation subject to part I or part III, such transportation would be subject to part I and part III, respectively, and be regulated as transportation subject to those parts of the act.

These definitions, as rewritten, also dealt with the case where a person (acting as agent or under a contractual arrangement) performed transfer, collection, or delivery services by motor vehicle within terminal areas for carriers by railroad, express companies, other motor carriers, or water carriers, and provided that in such a case the transportation should be regulated as transportation performed by the person for whom the services were rendered in the same manner as the railroad, express, motor carrier, or water transportation to which the services were incidental.

The provisions referred to above are retained in the conference substitute, but for purposes of simplification and clarification they are taken out of the definitions above referred to and, by section 17 (b), are included in a new subsection (c) added to section 202 of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Section 18 (b) (1) and (2). Trolley busses

The conference substitute in section 18 (b) (1) and (2) amends section 203 of the Interstate Commerce Act, by striking out the provision in clause (5) of subsection (b) which gives a qualified exemption from the provisions of part II applicable to trolley busses furnishing local passenger transportation service similar to street railway service, and provides an absolute exemption for such trolley busses by excluding them from the definition of the term "motor vehicle" in section 203 (a) (13).

Section 18 (b) (3). Motor vehicles operated by a farmer

Section 203 (b) (4a) of the Interstate Commerce Act gives a qualified exemption from the provisions of part II applicable to motor vehicles controlled and operated by any farmer and used in the transportation of his agricultural commodities and products thereof, or in the transportation of supplies to his farm.

The conference substitute in section 18 (b) (3) amends this provision by providing that the exemption shall apply only when such motor vehicles are used in such transportation.

Section 18 (b) (4). Federation of cooperative associations

Section 203 (b) (4b) of the Interstate Commerce Act gives a qualified exemption from the provisions of part II applicable to motor vehicles controlled and operated by a cooperative association as defined in the Agricultural Marketing Act, approved June 15, 1929.

The conference substitute in section 18 (b) (4) retains this provision and, in addition, grants the same exemption to motor vehicles controlled and operated by a federation of such cooperative associations if such federation possesses no greater powers or purposes than cooperative associations so defined.

Section 18 (b) (5). Ordinary livestock

The conference substitute amends section 203 (b) (6) of the Interstate Commerce Act which provides among other things a qualified exemption from the provisions of part II applicable to motor vehicles used in carrying property consisting of livestock, by limiting the exemption to the carriage of ordinary livestock.

Section 18 (b) (6). Casual transportation by motor vehicle

Section 203 (b) (9) of the Interstate Commerce Act provides a qualified exemption from the provisions of part II applicable to the casual, occasional, or reciprocal transportation of passengers or property for compensation by any person not engaged in transportation by motor vehicle as a regular occupation or business.

The conference substitute in section 18 (b) (6) retains this provision but provides an exception in the case of such transportation of passengers, where the transportation is sold, or offered for sale, or furnished, or arranged for, by a broker or by any other person who sells or offers for sale transportation furnished by a person lawfully engaged in the transportation of passengers by motor vehicle under a certificate or permit issued by the Commission.

Section 19. Exemption of certain interstate and foreign operations of motor carriers

The House amendment added to section 204 (a) of the Interstate Commerce Act a new paragraph (4a) authorizing the Commission to make exemptions in the case of motor carriers operating in interstate or foreign commerce but physically operating wholly within the borders of a State. The exemptions were made dependent upon findings by the Commission that the operations were in fact of such nature, character, or quantity as not substantially to affect or impair uniform regulation by the Commission of transportation by motor carriers engaged in interstate commerce in effectuating the national transportation policy declared in the Act. This subparagraph provided that the filing of an application for exemption, accompanied by a certificate of the State board of the State in which the operations of the carriers were carried on, stating in the opinion of such board such carrier was entitled to a certificate of exemption, should exempt the carrier until final disposition of the application.

The conference substitute in section 19 follows the House amendment except that the provision relating to the certificate of a State board is changed so that the filing of such a certificate operates to exempt the carrier only after the expiration of 60 days from the date application is made to the Commission, thus giving the Commission 60 days within which it can act to prevent the automatic exemption from taking effect.

It is further provided that in case a motor carrier has become exempt as provided in this subparagraph, it shall not be considered to be a burden on interstate commerce for a State to regulate such carrier with respect to the operations covered by the exemption.

Section 20 (a). Authority to inquire into the management of the business of persons controlling motor carriers, etc.

The conference substitute in section 20 (a) amends section 204 (a) (7) of the Interstate Commerce Act which gives the Commission authority to inquire into the organization of motor carriers and brokers and into the management of their business, and to transmit to Congress from time to time such recommendations as to additional legislation relating to such carriers or brokers as the Commission may deem necessary.

The amendment retains the authority with respect to inquiry into the management of the business of motor carriers and brokers and strikes out the authority to inquire into the organization of such carriers and brokers. It broadens the provision so that the Commission will have this authority also with respect to the management of the business of persons controlling, controlled by, or under common control with, motor carriers, to the extent that the business of such persons is related to the management of the business of such motor carriers. A further change is made to authorize the Commission to transmit to Congress from time to time such recommendations as the Commission may deem necessary, in addition to recommendations as to additional legislation.

Section 20 (b). Code of fair competition

Section 204 (b) of the Interstate Commerce Act provides that the provisions of any code of fair competition for any industry embracing motor carriers approved pursuant to the National Industrial Recovery Act which is in conflict or inconsistent with any action under the provisions of part II of the Interstate Commerce Act shall have no force and effect. The conference substitute in section 20 (b) repeals the said subsection because it is obsolete.

Section 20 (d). Joint boards—failure of member to participate

The conference substitute in section 20 (d) amends the proposed new subsection (b) of section 205 of the Interstate Commerce Act by adding a new provision reading as follows:

"The failure of a duly appointed member of a joint board to participate in any hearing on a matter referred to such joint board after notice thereof shall be considered to constitute, as to the matter referred, a waiver of action on the part of the State from which such member was appointed."

Section 20 (e). "Grandfather" certificates based on seasonal operations

The conference substitute, in section 20 (e), amends section 206 (a) of the Interstate Commerce Act, relating to the issuance of "grandfather" certificates to common carriers by motor vehicles engaged in seasonal operations on June 1, 1935, by requiring that the carriers must have "so operated since that time" in order to be entitled to a certificate.

Provision relating to power of the Commission to limit scope of motor-carrier operations

Section 21 of the House amendment amended subsection (a) of section 208 and subsection (b) of section 209 of part II of the Interstate Commerce Act, by providing that the Commission should not impose any condition or limitation which would prevent a motor carrier entitled to a certificate or permit on the basis of its operations on or prior to June 1, 1935, or July 1, 1935, respectively, from transporting any commodity or class thereof which it transported, or from engaging in transportation from or to points to or from which it transported such commodity or class, on or prior to said dates.

These amendments were intended to correct certain purported inequities which had developed in the administration of part II of the Interstate Commerce Act. Various proposed modifications of these amendments were considered by the conference committee but no satisfactory amendment was presented to the conferees. In view of this fact, and in view of the fact that the provisions proposed to be amended have been in effect since 1935 and readjustments in the business of motor carriers have thus far taken place upon the basis of the present provisions of law, the conference committee omitted these proposed amendments to sections 208 and 209 from the conference substitute bill.

Section 21 (a). Dual operations under certificates and permits, motor carriers

The conference substitute in section 21 (a) amends section 210 of the Interstate Commerce Act which prohibits a person from holding at the same time both a certificate as a common carrier of property by motor vehicle and a permit as a contract carrier of property by motor vehicle over the same route or within the same territory, unless for good cause shown the Commission shall find that both forms of operating authority may be held consistent with the public interest and with the policy declared in part II, so that the section will apply not only to a particular motor carrier but also to any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with, such person.

Section 22 (b). Undue preference or advantage

The conference substitute in section 22 (b) amends section 216 (d) of the Interstate Commerce Act by extending the prohibition against undue or unreasonable preference to cover a region, district, or territory, so as to make it conform to the revised section 3 (1) of the Interstate Commerce Act applicable to common carriers subject to part I.

Section 22 (c). Suspension of schedules of common carriers by motor vehicle; burden of proof

Section 216 (g) of the Interstate Commerce Act authorizes the Commission to suspend any schedule of a common carrier by motor vehicle which states a new rate or charge or any new rule or regulation affecting a rate or charge. The operation of such schedule may be suspended for an initial period of 90 days which may be extended but not for a longer period in the aggregate than 180 days. The conference substitute in section 22 (c) retains the suspension power but provides for a suspension period which shall not exceed 7 months.

Said section 216 (g) also provides that the burden of proof shall be upon the common carrier to show that the increased rate or the proposed rule, etc., is just and reasonable. The conference substitute amends the burden-of-proof rule by providing that the burden of proof shall be upon the common carrier to show that any proposed changed rate or rule, etc., is just and reasonable.

Section 22 (d). Rule of rate making for motor carriers

The conference substitute in section 22 (d) amends section 216 (i) of the Interstate Commerce Act to read as follows:

"(i) In the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates, fares, and charges for the transportation of passengers or property by common carriers by motor vehicle, and classifications, regulations, and practices relating thereto, the Commission shall give due consideration, among other factors, to the inherent advantages of transportation by such carriers; to the effect of rates upon the movement of traffic by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed; to the need, in the public interest, of adequate and efficient transportation service by such carriers at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service; and to the need of revenues sufficient to enable such carriers, under honest, economical, and efficient management, to provide such service."

The change from existing law is the addition of the words "and classifications, regulations, and practices relating thereto," and the words "by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed." The addition of these words makes this subsection in this respect correspond to amended section 15a of part I and section 307 (f) of the new part III.

The rule of rate making for contract carriers by motor vehicle is in amended section 218 (b) of part II, and the rule for contract carriers by water is in section 307 (h) of the new part III.

Section 23 (e). Schedules of rates, and contracts, of contract carriers by motor vehicle

Section 24 of the House amendment amended subsection (a) of section 218 of the Interstate Commerce Act, which relates to schedules of rates and to contracts of contract carriers by motor vehicles. It provided that the schedules required to be filed with the Commission by such carriers should contain the minimum charges actually maintained and charged. It retained the provision that the Commission, in its discretion, might require such a carrier to file with it, in lieu of such schedules, copies of contracts between it and shippers. The section authorized the Commission to make public the min mum rates or charges contained in such contracts but prohibited it from making public the names of the persons for whom the property is transported and other terms of the contracts, except where the Commission determined such contracts should be made available as a part of the record in a formal proceeding provided the Commission found such action consistent with the public interest.

The conference substitute in section 23 (a) retains the provision of this section of the House amendment which required the schedules to contain the rates actually maintained and charged. A provision is added which makes it the duty of every contract carrier by motor vehicle to establish and observe reasonable minimum rates and charges and reasonable regulations and practices to be applied in connection therewith.

The provision with respect to the filing of contracts in lieu of schedules is omitted in view of the provision in the present law in section 220 (a) of the Interstate Commerce Act, which gives the Commission authority to require any motor carrier to file with it a copy of any contract between the carrier and any other carrier or person in relation to any traffic affected by the provisions of part II of the act.

The provision with respect to publicity of such contracts is also omitted, but in lieu thereof provisions are added by section 24 to said section 220 (a) providing for publicity under certain conditions.

Section 23 (b). Commission's power to prescribe minimum charges of contract carriers by motor vehicle

The conference substitute amends section 218 (b) of the Interstate Commerce Act. This subsection of existing law authorizes the Commission to prescribe the minimum charge of a contract carrier by motor vehicle or the rule, regulation, or practice affecting such charge or the value of the services where the Commission finds that any charge, rule, regulation, or practice of such a carrier contravenes the policy declared in section 202 (a) of part II. The Commission may prescribe such minimum charge, rule, regulation, or practice as in its judgment may be necessary or desirable in the public interest and to promote the policy declared in said section.

The conference substitute in section 23 (b) retains these provisions but amends them by providing that the Commission may prescribe the just and reasonable minimum rate or charge, or the rule, regulation, or practice affecting such minimum rate or charge, where the Commission finds that such rate or charge, or rule, regulation, or practice contravenes the national transportation policy declared in this act or is in contravention of any provision of part II. The Commission is authorized to prescribe such just and reasonable minimum rate or charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice as in its judgment may be necessary or desirable in the public interest and to promote such policy, and will not be in contravention of any provision of such part.

Section 23 (c). Suspension of schedules of contract carriers by motor vehicle; burden of proof

Section 218 (c) of the Interstate Commerce Act authorizes the Commission to suspend any schedule of a contract carrier by motor vehicle which states a reduced charge directly or by means of any rule, regulation, or practice. The operation of such schedule may be suspended for an initial period of 90 days, which may be extended but not for a longer period in the aggregate than 180 days. The conference substitute in section 23 (c) retains the suspension power but provides for a suspension period which shall not exceed 7 months.

The present law places no burden of proof upon the contract carrier to show that any proposed charge for a new service or any reduced charge or changed rule, etc., affecting such charge is just and reasonable. The conference substitute adds a provision that the rule as to burden of proof specified in section 216 (g) with respect to common carriers by motor vehicle shall apply to contract carriers by motor vehicle.

Section 24. Accounts, records, and reports of motor carriers

Section 220 of the Interstate Commerce Act authorizes the Commission to require annual and other reports from motor carriers and brokers and to prescribe the forms of accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by such carriers; and authorizes the Commission or its duly authorized agents to have access to lands, buildings, and such accounts, records, and memoranda for inspection and examination.

The conference substitute in section 24 retains these provisions, and said section amends section 220 by authorizing the Commission to require annual and other reports from a lessor, which is defined to mean a lessor of any right to operate as a motor carrier. The amended section authorizes the Commission or its agents to inspect and copy accounts, records, etc., of lessors; and, also, such accounts, records, etc., of any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with any such carrier as the Commission deems relevant to such person's relation to or transactions with such carrier. Certain other changes are made in the amended section with respect to accounts, records, and reports in order to make the requirements thereof more definite and specific.

Section 24. Accident reports, motor carriers

The conference substitute in section 24 adds to section 220 of the Interstate Commerce Act (which relates to accounts, records, and reports) a new subsection (f), reading as follows:

"(f) No report by any motor carrier of any accident arising in the course of the operations of such carrier, made pursuant to any requirement of the Commission, and no report by the Commission of any investigation of any such accident, shall be admitted as evidence or used for any other purpose in any suit or action for damages growing out of any matter mentioned in such report or investigation."

Section 24. Contracts of contract carriers by motor vehicle

Section 220 (a) of the Interstate Commerce Act provides that the Commission may require any motor carrier to file with it a copy of any contract, agreement, or arrangement between such carrier and any person in relation to any traffic affected by the provisions of part II. The conference substitute in section 24 adds an additional provision that the Commission shall not make public any such contract, etc., between a contract carrier by motor vehicle and a shipper except as a part of the record in a formal proceeding where it considers such action consistent with the public interest. It further provides that if such contract fails to conform to the published schedule of the contract carrier as required by section 218 (a), the Commission may make public such of the provisions of the contract as it considers necessary to disclose such failure and the extent thereof.

Section 25 (a). Service of notice

The conference substitute amends section 221 (a) of the Interstate Commerce Act, which relates to the designation of an agent by a motor carrier to receive service of notices or orders, by adding a new provision that in proceedings before the Commission involving the lawfulness of rates, fares, charges, classifications, or practices, service of notice upon an attorney-in-fact of a carrier who has filed a tariff or schedule in behalf of such carrier shall be deemed to be due and sufficient service upon the carrier.

Section 25 (b). Orders of the Commission in motor carrier proceedings

The conference substitute in section 25 (b) amends section 221 (b) of the Interstate Commerce Act, which provides that all orders of the Commission shall take effect within such reasonable time as the Commission may specify. The amendment requires that such orders shall take effect within "not less than 30 days." This amendment makes section 221 (b) correspond in this respect to section 15 (2) of part I and with section 315 (d) in new part III.

Section 25 (c). Penalty in case of disclosure of information by special agent or examiner

The conference substitute amends section 222 (d) of the Interstate Commerce Act, which provides a penalty in the case where a special agent or examiner divulges information which may come to his knowledge during the course of his examination of accounts, records, or memoranda of motor carriers or brokers, by specifically providing that the offense shall be a misdemeanor and by reducing the maximum penalty provided under present law from $5,000 to $500 and from 2 years' imprisonment to 6 months' imprisonment.

Section 25 (d). Penalties for failure of motor carriers or other persons to make reports, keep accounts, etc.

Section 222 (g) of the Interstate Commerce Act provides certain penalties for failure on the part of motor carriers, brokers, and certain other persons to make reports or to keep accounts, or for falsifying, destroying, etc., reports, accounts, and records, or for filing any false report, account, etc. Section 25 (d) of the conference substitute amends said section 222 (g) by adding thereto certain other acts of motor carriers, brokers, or other persons, in violation of part II to which the same penalties are made applicable.

Section 26 (a). Allowances to shippers

The House amendment in section 23 included a new section providing for allowances to an owner of property transported who rendered any service connected with the transportation or furnished any instrumentality used therein. The conference substitute in section 26 (a) includes this provision in a new section 225 in part II of the Interstate Commerce Act. It amends the said provision by requiring that such allowance shall be published in tariffs or schedules filed in the manner provided in said part II.

Section 302. Definitions in proposed part III

The definitions contained in the conference substitute conform, for the most part, to those in the House amendment.

As stated in the report of the House committee, the scope of water regulation, which is prescribed by virtue of the definition of "interstate or foreign commerce," is limited to domestic transportation, and to foreign transportation to the extent that there is a movement from a point in the United States to another point in the United States either before or after transshipment at a place within the United States. Transportation between the continental United States and Hawaii, Alaska, and the various possessions of the United States does not come within the scope of this legislation.

Section 302 of the new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, added by the House amendment, contained definitions of "common carrier by water" and "contract carrier by water." These definitions contained provisions which provided that in case of certain water-carrier operations performed by rail carriers subject to part I, or by motor carriers subject to part II, incidental to transportation subject to parts I and II, respectively, such transportation would be subject to part I or part II, as the case might be, and be regulated as transportation subject to those parts of the act.

These definitions also dealt with the case where a person (acting as agent or under a contractual arrangement) performed certain services by water for carriers by railroad, express companies, motor carriers, or other water carriers, and provided that in such a case the transportation should be considered to be engaged in by the person for whom the services were performed, and regulated in the same manner as the railroad, express, motor carrier, or water transportation to which the services were incidental.

The provisions referred to above are retained in the conference substitute, but for purposes of simplification and clarification they are taken out of the definitions above referred to and are included in subsection (f) of section 303 of the new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act.

The conference substitute also makes a change in the description of the transportation to which the provisions above referred to relate. The transportation as to which this special treatment was provided in the definitions in the House amendment was described in two places in the definition of "common carrier by water" and in two places in the definition of "contract carrier by water," but the language was not uniform in all of such places. As incorporated in the new subsection (f) of section 303, this language is as follows:

"in the performance within terminal areas of transfer, collection, or delivery services, or in the performance of floatage, car ferry, lighterage, or towage."

In the definition of "common carrier by water" as included in section 302 (d) of the conference substitute, the following language is included:

"except transportation by water by an express company subject to part I in the conduct of its express business, which shall be considered to be and shall be regulated as transportation subject to part I."

The definition of "contract carrier by water" in the House amendment contained a sentence as follows:

"For the purposes of this paragraph a person which, under a charter, lease, or other agreement, furnishes a vessel to another person, for compensation, for use in the transportation of property of such other person, shall itself not be considered to be engaged in the transportation of such property as a contract carrier by water."

In the conference substitute the word "not", which was inserted on the House floor, has been omitted, but the provision (which is in sec. 302 (e)) has been limited so that it only applies where the vessel is furnished to a person other than a carrier subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and the language is clarified to make sure that the person furnishing the vessel will not, simply by reason of furnishing the vessel, become a contract carrier subject to part III of the act as to that part of its business not related to the furnishing and use of the vessel. A new provision is added giving the Commission authority to exempt (either permanently or for a limited time) any person or class of persons when the Commission deems it unnecessary, in order to effectuate the national transportation policy, for such person or class of persons to be regulated as a contract carrier or contract carriers.

Section 303. Water carrier exemptions

Section 303 (b) of the proposed part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, in the House amendment, exempted transportation by a contract carrier by water of commodities in bulk in a vessel the cargo space of which is used for the carrying of not more than three such commodities at any given time.

In the conference substitute this provision is extended to cover common carriers by water as well as contract carriers by water.

This provision as included in the House amendment was susceptible to the interpretation that if at any time the vessel carried three bulk commodities or less, transportation thereon would be exempt as to any number of bulk commodities. Therefore, without making any change in the intended policy and in order to clarify this provision the first sentence has been changed to read as follows:

"Nothing in this part shall apply to the transportation by a water carrier of commodities in bulk when the cargo space of the vessel in which such commodities are transported is being used for the carrying of not more than three such commodities."

This subsection in the House amendment also provided that it should apply only in the case of commodities received and delivered by the carrier "without mark or count." In the conference substitute the word "transportation" is inserted before the words "mark or count".

Section 303 (e) of the proposed part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, in the House amendment, contained provisions granting exemptions to contract carriers by water under certain conditions. The dates contained therein governing exemption of carriers in operation at the time part III takes effect are changed from January 1, 1939, and October 1, 1939, to January 1, 1940, and January 1, 1941, respectively.

Section 303 (f) of the proposed part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, contained in the House amendment, read as follows:

"(f) Nothing in this part shall be construed to affect any law of navigation, the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, liabilities of vessels and their owners for loss or damage, or laws respecting seamen, or any other statute or maritime law, regulation, or custom not in conflict with the provisions of this part."

This provision is retained in the conference substitute but is transferred to the section dealing with repeals of existing law.

Section 303 (l). Operating authority of carriers whose exemption is terminated

The conference bill includes as section 303 (l) a new provision providing that whenever transportation exempted under the provisions of subsection (g) or (e) of such section becomes subject to regulation the carrier may continue operation for 120 days without a certificate or permit, and if application for a certificate or permit covering the previously exempted transportation is made within such period, the Commission shall issue a certificate or permit, whichever is appropriate, authorizing the transportation previously exempted.

Section 304 (b). Authority to inquire into the business of water carriers and other persons

Section 304 (b) of the new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, added by the House amendment, gave the Commission authority to inquire into and report on the organization of water carriers and the management of their business, and to transmit to Congress from time to time such recommendations as the Commission might deem necessary.

The conference substitute in section 304 (b) omits the provision with respect to authority to inquire into and report on the organization of water carriers and broadens the application of the amended subsection so that the Commission will have authority to inquire into the management of the business of persons controlling, controlled by, or under common control with, water carriers, to the extent that the business of such persons is related to the control or management of the business of such carriers. A further change is made to specifically authorize the Commission to recommend to Congress such additional legislation as it deems necessary.

Section 305 (c). Undue preference or advantage

Section 305 (c) of the proposed part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, in the House amendment, prohibited common carriers by water from giving any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage in certain specified cases. The conference substitute retains this provision but after the word "locality" adds "region, district, territory," so as to conform with similar provisions in parts I and II.

Section 306 (d). Tariffs of common carriers by water

Section 306 (d) of the new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act proposed by the House amendment, prohibits any change in any rate or charge of a common carrier by water except after 30 days' notice unless the Commission allows a change upon shorter notice.

This subsection is retained, and a provision is added that no common carrier by water, unless otherwise provided by this part, shall engage in transportation subject to this part unless the rates, fares, and charges of said carrier have been filed and published in accordance with the provisions of this part.

Section 306 (e). Schedules of contract carriers by water

Section 306 (e) of new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act proposed by the House amendment made it the duty of every contract carrier by water, among other things, to file with the Commission and keep open for public inspection schedules of minimum rates or charges actually maintained and charged by such carrier.

The provisions of the House amendment are retained and three additional provisions added as follows:

1. It is made the duty of every contract carrier by water to establish and observe reasonable minimum rates and charges and reasonable regulations and practices to be applied in connection with said reasonable minimum rates and charges.

2. A contract carrier is prohibited, unless otherwise provided by this part, from engaging in transportation unless the minimum rates or charges actually maintained and charged have been published, filed, and posted in accordance with the provisions of this part.

3. No new rate or charge shall be established and no reduction shall be made in any rate or charge except upon 30 days' notice of the proposed rate or charge, or of the proposed change, unless the Commission allows the establishment of such rate, charge, or change upon shorter notice.

Contracts of Contract Carriers by Water

Section 306 (e) of the new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, proposed by the House amendment, authorizes the Commission in its discretion to require any contract carrier by water to file with it, in lieu of schedules of rates actually maintained and charged by such carriers, its contracts with shippers providing for transportation of property. The section further provided for making public the rates contained in such contracts, but prohibited making public the names of the persons for whom the property is transported and other terms of the contract, except where the Commission made such contract available as part of the record in a formal proceeding where it considered such action consistent with the public interest.

The provision with respect to the filing of contracts in lieu of schedules is omitted in view of the provision in section 313 (b) of the new part III which gives the Commission authority to require any water carrier to file with it a copy of any contract, charter, or agreement between such carrier and any other carrier or person in relation to traffic affected by the said part. The provision with respect to publicity of such contracts is also omitted, but in lieu thereof a provision is added to said section 313 (b) prohibiting the Commission from making public any contract, charter, or agreement between a contract carrier by water and a shipper, or any of the terms thereof, except as a part of the record in a formal proceeding where the Commission considers such action consistent with the public interest. It is further provided in such section 313 (b) that if it appears from an examination of any such contract by the Commission that it fails to conform to the published schedule of the contract carrier as required by section 306 (e) the Commission may make public such of the provisions of the contract as the Commission considers necessary to disclose such failure and the extent thereof.

These provisions are essentially the same as those in the case of contracts of contract carriers by motor vehicle.

Section 307 (e). Divisions of joint rates

Section 307 (e) of new part III of the House amendment contained provisions authorizing the Commission to prescribe the reasonable divisions of joint rates of common carriers by water, or of such carriers and common carriers by railroad or by motor vehicle, and to require adjustment thereof between such carriers from the date of filing the complaint or entry of the order of investigation or such other dates subsequent thereto as the Commission finds justified.

The conference substitute retains the provision authorizing the Commission to prescribe the divisions but limits the power of the Commission to require adjustments to those cases in which the joint rates have been established pursuant to a finding or order of the Commission. The substitute also prescribes certain factors to which the Commission is directed to give consideration in determining the reasonableness of the divisions prescribed by it. By these changes the provisions with respect to divisions of joint rates under new part III are made substantially the same as those applicable to divisions under part I.

Section 307 (f). Rule for rate making for common carriers by water

Section 307 (f) of the House amendment contained a rule of rate making, applicable to common carriers by water, similar to the rule prescribed in section 15a of the Interstate Commerce Act. The conference substitute retains this provision but after the language directing the Commission to "give due consideration, among other factors, to the effect of rates upon the movement of traffic," the following words are added: "by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed."

House Amendment as to Reductions of Rates

In the House amendment in section 307 (f) of the new proposed part III of the Interstate Commerce Act there was included the provision as follows:

"In order that the public at large may enjoy the benefit and economy afforded by each type of transportation, the Commission shall permit each type of carrier or carriers to reduce rates so long as such rates maintain a compensatory return to the carrier or carriers after taking into consideration overhead and all other elements entering into the cost to the carrier or carriers for the service rendered: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall be construed so as to affect the long- and short-haul provision of section 4."

A similar provision, with the exception of the proviso, was included in the Senate bill.

The conference substitute omits these provisions of the Senate bill and the House amendment.

It will be observed that this amendment restricts any type of carrier from reducing its rates below an amount sufficient to cover its overhead and other elements of cost for the service rendered, including a compensatory return. This compels the carrier to charge a higher rate than is commonly imposed for carrying a great percentage of all freight by land and water in domestic commerce. The immediate effect of this amendment, if enforced, would be to compel an increase of rates on a large part of the freight now carried by ships, highway, and rails.

Everywhere in the world transportation rates take into consideration the class of traffic carried and at what rate it will move. Raw materials such as grains, farm products, coal, and other heavy materials frequently move at a rate less than required by this provision. Low-profit freight compensates for its carriage, but ordinarily the carrier could not successfully continue in business on low-cost freight alone. It is the greater profit made on high-class freight that makes the maintenance of our low-cost transportation system possible.

At the present time about 100 railroads are under the protection of the courts because their revenues do not meet their expenses. This proposed amendment might drive these lines out of existence if enforced against them because it would force their rates to a higher level and would transfer the business to their competitors.

This proposed amendment, if enacted, would impose numerous administrative difficulties; for instance, establishment of a permissible rate on a given product would require the production of evidence to show from the whole income and expense accounts of the carrier what rate would be required to meet the standard of rate making this amendment would establish.

Such an amendment would place its greatest burdens on the transportation of heavy freight such as farmers' products and would cause an unwarranted increase in freight rates which would be highly detrimental to our transportation system.

The conferees are unanimously in harmony in the viewpoint that the inherent advantages of each type of carrier should be preserved for the benefit of the Nation. Legitimate regulation must look to the protection of the economic advantage of each type of carrier against destructive competition of the other. No carriers should be required to charge unreasonable rates for the benefit or purpose of compelling diversion of traffic to a competitor.

The other provisions of this bill afford ample protection for the preservation of the inherent advantages of water transportation.

The new declaration of policy to be embodied in the Interstate Commerce Act provides a rule of interpretation applicable to all the provisions of that Act, namely, that "all of the provisions of this Act shall be administered and enforced with a view to carrying out the above declaration of policy." The declaration of policy also asserts it to be "the national transportation policy of the Congress to provide for fair and impartial regulation of all modes of transportation" subject to the Act. It further declares that the provisions of the Act are to be "so administered as to recognize and preserve the inherent advantages of each."

It is further declared that the end to be accomplished is the coordination and preservation of a national transportation system by water, highway, and rail.

This legislation is a forward and fostering step for water transportation as well as national transportation. Heretofore, with limited exceptions, water transportation has not been within the fostering care of interstate regulation. This measure will place upon the Interstate Commerce Commission not only the power, but the duty, to protect and foster water transportation and preserve its inherent advantages.

Section 307 (f) provides that the Commission in prescribing rates for common carriers by water shall give due consideration "to the effect of rates upon the movement of traffic by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed; to the need, in the public interest of adequate and efficient water transportation service at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service." This rule of rate making for water transportation is wholly inconsistent with the theory that the Commission might prescribe an unreasonable rate for a water carrier for the purpose of forcing its traffic to a competing carrier.

Other provisions of the conference substitute, further protect water carriers in their right to operate at low rates. In section 305 (c), prohibiting common carriers by water to give undue or unreasonable preference or advantage, a proviso is included as follows:

"Provided, That this subsection shall not be construed to apply to discriminations, prejudice, or disadvantage to the traffic of any other carrier of whatever description."

This subsection also contains a provision as follows:

"Differences in the classifications, rates, fares, charges, rules, regulations, and practices of a water carrier in respect of water transportation from those in effect by a rail carrier with respect to rail transportation shall not be deemed to constitute unjust discrimination, prejudice, or disadvantage, or an unfair or destructive competitive practice, within the meaning of any provision of this Act."

Outside of special provisions designed to protect water carriers the rule of reasonable rates in itself prohibits the imposition of an unreasonably high rate for any carrier for the purpose of aiding a competitive carrier. There is no authority for the contention that the Commission has any right to require a rate higher than is reasonable for the purpose of diverting traffic from any given type of carrier to a competitor.

Section 307 (g) and (i). Suspension of tariffs and schedules; burden of proof

Section 307 (g) and (i) of new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, as added by the House amendment, authorized the Commission to suspend any schedule of a water carrier which stated a new rate or charge or a reduced rate or charge or any new rule or regulation affecting such rate or charge. In the case of a contract carrier by water the rate, etc., could be suspended for an initial period of 90 days, which could be extended, but not for a longer period in the aggregate than 180 days.

The conference substitute provides for a suspension period which shall not exceed 7 months. It also includes a new provision applicable to water carriers that the burden of proof shall be upon the carrier to show that a proposed changed rate, charge, rule, or regulation is just and reasonable. Corresponding changes are made in sections 216 (g) and 218 (c) of the Interstate Commerce Act. As a result of these changes provisions with respect to the periods of suspension and the burden of proof are made the same for motor carriers and for water carriers.

Section 307 (h). Provisions of charters, contracts, etc., of contract carriers by water; unlawful rates, rules, and practices

Section 307 (h) of the new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act added by the House amendment gave the Commission authority to prescribe the form or provisions of charters, contracts, agreements, or undertakings of contract carriers by water when it found that such charters, contracts, agreements, or undertakings contravene the national transportation policy declared in the act. The conference substitute modifies this subsection so that the Commission will not have this authority.

In the conference substitute in section 307 (h) this subsection, in its application to rates of contract carriers, is confined to minimum rates since the only regulation of contract carrier rates is as to minimum rates. The power of the Commission with respect to rules, regulations, and practices of contract carriers is limited to those "affecting such minimum rate or charge, or the value of the service thereunder."

In the House amendment, the Commission's authority to prescribe the rate or rule was limited to cases where the Commission found that the rate or rule contravened the national transportation policy. The conference substitute retains this provision and, in addition, authorizes the Commission to prescribe the minimum rate or rule where it finds such rate or rule is in contravention of any provision of new part III.

This subsection further provides that the minimum rate or charge, or the rule, regulation, or practice, prescribed by the Commission, shall give no undue advantage or preference to a contract carrier in competition with a common carrier by water, and the Commission is directed to "give due consideration to the cost of the services rendered by such carriers." In this provision as contained in the House amendment the language was as follows: "give due consideration to the cost of the services rendered by such contract carriers."

Section 309 (a). "Grandfather" date for common and contract carriers by water

Section 309 of new part III added to the Interstate Commerce Act by the House amendment provided a "grandfather" date of June 1, 1939, in the case of common and contract carriers by water. The conference substitute changes this date to January 1, 1940.

Section 310. Dual operations under certificates and permits—water carriers

Section 310 of new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, added by the House amendment, authorized the Commission to issue to a water carrier both a certificate and a permit if the Commission was of the opinion that the granting of both a certificate and a permit to the carrier would be consistent with the public interest and with the national transportation policy.

In the conference substitute this section is changed so as to make it similar to the corresponding provision relating to motor carriers (sec. 210 of pt. II), and prohibits any person from holding both a certificate and a permit unless for good cause shown the Commission shall find that both may be held by such person consistently with the public interest and with the national transportation policy, and this restriction also applies to any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with such person. Other provisions of the bill are changed so that this limitation will apply not only to new operations but also to operations under "grandfather" applications.

Section 313. Accounts, records, and reports—water carriers

The House amendment in section 313 of new part III contained provisions with respect to accounts, records, and reports of water carriers. It authorized the Commission to require annual and other reports from water carriers and to prescribe the forms of accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by such carriers; and gave authority to the Commission or its agents to inspect and examine such accounts, records, and memoranda. The conference substitute retains these provisions and, in addition, among other things, authorizes the Commission to require annual and other reports from a lessor, which term is defined to mean a lessor of any right to operate as a water carrier. The Commission is authorized in its discretion to prescribe a uniform system of accounts applicable to any class of water carriers and the period of time within which such class shall have such uniform system. The amended section authorizes the Commission to prescribe for water carriers the classes of property for which depreciation charges may be included and the rates of depreciation. The Commission may also prescribe the forms of accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by a lessor. The Commission is given authority to inspect and copy the accounts, records, memoranda, and other documents of a lessor and of any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with any water carrier as the Commission deems relevant to such person's relation to or transactions with such carrier. Certain other provisions are included corresponding to those included in amended sections 20 and 220.

Section 315 (a). Service of notice

Section 315 (a) of the new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act added by the House amendment made it the duty of every water carrier to file with the Commission a designation of an agent upon whom services of notices or orders might be made. The conference substitute retains this provision and amends it by providing that in proceedings before the Commission involving the lawfulness of rates, fares, charges, classifications, or practices, service of notice upon an attorney in fact of a carrier who has filed a tariff or schedule in behalf of such carrier shall be deemed to be due and sufficient service upon the carrier.

Section 317 (d). Penalty in case of failure to make full, true, and correct entries, etc.

The conference substitute amends section 317 (d) of the new part III added to the Interstate Commerce Act by the House amendment, so as to make the penalty of such subsection apply in the case of any person who shall willfully neglect to make full, true, and correct entries in accounts, records, or memoranda, or who shall willfully keep any accounts, records, or memoranda contrary to the rules, regulations, or order of the Commission.

Section 317 (e). Penalty in case of disclosure of information by special agent or examiner

Subsection (e) of section 317 of the new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act added by the House amendment provided a maximum penalty of $5,000, or imprisonment for 2 years, or both such fine and imprisonment, in case of the knowing and willful disclosure by a special agent or examiner of the Commission of information coming to his knowledge during the course of examination of the accounts, records, and memoranda of a water carrier. The conference substitute modifies this provision by specifically providing that the offense shall be a misdemeanor and by reducing the maximum fine to $500 and the maximum imprisonment to 6 months.

Section 319. Appointment of employees

Section 319 of the new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act added by the House amendment authorized the Commission to employ necessary experts, assistants, special agents, examiners, attorneys, and other employees. This provision is retained in the conference substitute. The Senate bill provided that compensation of employees should be determined in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923 "insofar as said act is applicable." This reference to the Classification Act is not included in the conference substitute because the well-settled interpretation of laws previously enacted by Congress has been that where authority is given to an administrative agency to employ personnel, both the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923 apply to the appointment of such employees and the fixing of their compensation unless a clear intention to the contrary is indicated in the authorizing legislation. It is clear, therefore, that under this provision of the conference substitute the new personnel authorized to be appointed by the Commission will be appointed subject to the civil-service laws, and their compensation will be fixed under the Classification Act of 1923.

A new sentence is added to this section in the conference substitute authorizing examiners to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence, since similar provisions are now contained in parts I and II of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Conference agreements between water carriers under section 15 of the Shipping Act, 1916

Under section 15 of the Shipping Act, 1916, water carriers engaged in commerce by water subject to that act are authorized to enter into conference agreements relating to rates, competition, pooling, allotment of ports, limiting or regulating the volume of traffic, and other matters, and the carriers involved are exempted from the operation of the antitrust laws when such agreements are approved by the Maritime Commission.

Under section 320 (a) of the new part III in the conference substitute the provisions of section 15 of the Shipping Act, 1916, are repealed insofar as they would authorize any such agreements to be entered into with respect to transportation subject to the new part III of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Under section 320 (c) of the conference substitute it is provided, however, that nothing in section 320 (a) shall be construed to prevent a carrier subject to part III from entering into such agreements with respect to transportation not subject to part III.

By virtue of section 322 of the conference substitute all agreements heretofore entered into under such section 15 of the Shipping Act, 1916, will continue to be lawful even to the extent that they relate to transportation subject to part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, until such time as the Commission may find such agreements in violation of the provisions of part III or inconsistent with the national transportation policy.

Investigation of various modes of transportation

There is included in the conference substitute a new provision (part I of title III of the bill) establishing a board of investigation and research (to be composed of three members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate) which is specifically directed to investigate—

(1) The relative economy and fitness of carriers by railroad, motor carriers, and water carriers for transportation service, or any particular classes or descriptions thereof, with the view of determining the service for which each type of carrier is especially fitted or unfitted; the methods by which each type can and should be developed so that there may be provided a national transportation system adequate to meet the needs of the commerce of the United States, of the Postal Service, and of the national defense;

(2) The extent to which right-of-way or other transportation facilities and special services have been or are provided from public funds for the use, within the territorial limits of the continental United States, of each of the three types of carriers without adequate compensation, direct or indirect, therefor, and the extent to which such carriers have been or are aided by donations of public property, payments from public funds in excess of adequate compensation for services rendered in return therefor, or extensions of Government credit; and

(3) The extent to which taxes are imposed upon such carriers by the United States, and the several States, and by other agencies of government, including county, municipal, district, and local agencies.

The Board is further authorized to investigate any other matters relating to rail carriers, motor carriers, or water carriers, which it may deem important to investigate for the improvement of transportation conditions and to effectuate the national transportation policy declared in the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

The Board is directed to report the results of this investigation, together with its recommendations, to the President and to the Congress.

The authority of the Board is to cease at the end of 2 years after the enactment of this legislation, unless extended by proclamation of the President for an additional period not exceeding 2 years.

Land-grant rates

Section 321 of part II of title III of the House amendment provided that the full applicable commercial rates, fares, or charges should be paid to any common carrier subject to the Interstate Commerce Act for transportation of persons or property for the United States, or on its behalf, but this provision was conditioned on the release by the carrier of claims against the United States to lands, interest in lands, compensation or reimbursements on account of lands, or interests in lands which have been granted, claimed to have been granted, or which it was claimed should have been granted to such carrier, under any grant from the United States.

The conference substitute changes this provision by making an exception from this requirement of the payment of full commercial rates by the United States, in the case of the transportation of military or naval property moving for military or naval use, and in the case of the transportation of members of the military or naval forces of the United States (or of property of such members) when such members are traveling on official duty. In the case of transportation thus excepted, existing legal requirements and arrangements providing for reduced rates will continue to apply.

Amendments to Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act

1. The House amendment in subsection (a) of section 331, title III, of the bill, amended certain portions of section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. It enlarged the authority of the Corporation so that purchases of railroad obligations, guaranty of payment thereof and loans authorized to be made by the Corporation to railroads or receivers or trustees of railroads, could be made for the purpose of bringing about a reduction of readjustment of principal and interest charges, and modified the standard governing the approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission of purchase of obligations, guaranty thereof, and loans.

The conference substitute, in section 331 of title III of the bill, omits the provision of the House amendment and retains present law, with certain exceptions as follows:

(a) It authorizes loans not only to railroads but to "receivers or trustees thereof."

(b) It further amends the present law by providing that a certificate of approval from the Interstate Commerce Commission shall not be required in the case of "purchases, or guaranties" of railroad obligations made for the maintenance of, or purchase of, equipment for railroads not in receivership or trusteeship. The present law excepts from the provisions requiring Commission approval in such cases only "loans" for such maintenance or purchase.

(c) It also increases the total amount of loans and commitments to railroads, receivers, and trustees, and purchases and guaranties of obligations of railroads from $350,000,000 to $500,000,000, in addition to loans and commitments made prior to January 31, 1935, and renewals of loans and commitments so made.

2. The House amendment, in subsection (b) of such section 331, also amended section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act by providing that the title of any owner to any property leased or conditionally sold to a railroad which the Corporation had financed or aided in financing, or the right of such owner to take possession of the property, should not be affected or restricted by the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act.

The House amendment also provided that the title of any owner of a collateral note evidencing a loan to a railroad or receiver or trustee thereof from the Corporation "heretofore or hereafter made by the Corporation" and the right of any such owner to acquire a title to the collateral securing such note, free and clear of any equity of redemption, in compliance with the contract of pledge, and thereafter to deal with the same as the absolute owner thereof shall not be affected or restricted by or pursuant to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act.

The conference substitute retains these amendments but changes them insofar as they apply to the title to collateral notes evidencing loans from the Corporation "heretofore or hereafter" made by the Corporation, so that they will apply only to a collateral note evidencing a loan from the Corporation to a railroad "not now in receivership or involved in proceedings under section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act, or a receiver or trustee thereof."

BRIDGES OVER NAVIGABLE WATERS

Title III of the House amendments, in part I thereof, contains provisions (secs. 301–312) intended to supersede provisions of existing law relating to the construction and alteration of bridges over navigable waters of the United States, and providing for the apportionment between the owner of the bridge and the United States of the cost of building and altering such bridges.

These provisions are omitted from the conference substitute.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order against the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order against this conference report as now presented to the House. It will be remembered that on May 9 the House, by a majority vote, recommitted this transportation bill to the conferees with definite instructions to insist upon certain amendments. As to two of those amendments the conferees are reporting what might be termed "compromises." As to the third amendment, known generally as the Wadsworth amendment, the conferees have eliminated it entirely from this conference report. My contention is that in doing so the conferees have ignored the instructions of the House and have exceeded their power. Having been instructed by the House to insist upon this specific amendment, it was their duty, obviously, to strive earnestly in its behalf in their negotiations with the Senate conferees. Failing to persuade the Senate conferees to accept the Wadsworth amendment, it was their duty to report the amendment back to the House as being in disagreement, and to ask the House for further instructions concerning it. This the House conferees have failed to do. Instead, they have completely ignored the amendment in their report, and in doing so they have ignored the instructions of the House. I contend, sir, that the House, having once by a majority vote instructed its conferees to insist upon a certain amendment, and the Senate conferees having refused to accept it, it is the duty, under the rule, of the House conferees to report such disagreement to the House and await further instructions. This the House conferees have not done, and in failing to do so they have not only violated their instructions but attempted to subvert the rights of the House itself. Be it remembered that when the House has instructed its conferees, those conferees are bound by the instructions until released by the House.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Virginia, at this point, for the benefit of the Chair, make his point of order against the conference report?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the conference report because the conferees, in excess of their authority, have included in the bill, as reported back to the House at this time, matters that were not contained in the bill previously and were not covered by instructions which were given to the conferees when the matter was before the House.

The particular items to which I refer are subsections (14) and (16) of section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act as proposed to be amended by section 7 of the proposed Transportation Act of 1940, and to be found on pages 13 and 14 of the conference report.

Subsection (14), appearing on page 13, reads that—

(14) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (2), from and after the 1st day of July 1914, it shall be unlawful for any carrier, as defined in section 1 (3), or (after the date of the enactment of this amendatory section) any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with such a carrier to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water operated through the Panama Canal or elsewhere with which such carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic or any vessel carrying freight or passengers upon said water route or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense.

And along with this should be considered subsection (16), which provides as follows:

(16) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (14), the Commission shall have authority, upon application of any carrier, as defined in section 1 (3), and after hearing, by order to authorize such carrier to own or acquire ownership of, to lease or operate, to have or acquire control of, or to have or acquire an interest in a common carrier by water or vessel, not operated through the Panama Canal, with which the applicant does or may compete for traffic, if the Commission shall find that the continuance or acquisition of such ownership, lease, operation, control, or interest will not prevent such common carrier by water or vessel from being operated in the interest of the public and with advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people, and that it will not exclude, prevent, or reduce competition on the route by water under consideration: Provided, That if the transaction or interest sought to be entered into, continued, or acquired is within the scope of paragraph (2) (a), the provisions of paragraph (2) shall be applicable thereto in addition to the provisions of this paragraph: And provided further, That no such authorization shall be necessary if the carrier having the ownership, lease, operation, control, or interest has, prior to the date this section as amended becomes effective, obtained an order of extension under the provisions of paragraph (21) of this section, as in effect prior to such date, and such order is still in effect.

My point is, Mr. Speaker, this Congress, having carefully considered carriage of freight cargo by water or transportation by water, prescribed certain limitations and new matter cannot be included in the bill at this stage of the legislation without such matter having been considered in the House, without such matter having been considered in the Senate. This applies when a conference report has been returned to the House after instructions have been expressly given by this House on other points. It is beyond the jurisdiction or the authority of the conferees to write new matter that was not contained or treated of in the original bill as it passed the Senate or in the original bill as it passed the House or dealt with in the original conference report that was submitted.

While I recognize the generally accepted principle that there is very considerable authority vested in the conferees in the writing of a bill, there comes a time when there is a limit to the exercise of that authority and that power. That time comes when the conferees have written a bill within the limits that were prescribed by the Senate, and within the limits prescribed by the House, if not exceeded, but now they seek in a supplemental conference report to inject new matter that has never been considered by the House and never been considered by the Senate. I submit that such a rule would permit the conferees in any legislation to write anything that they wanted to without any limits whatsoever. This report exceeds their authority.

On the question of the ownership of stock in competing waterways this would permit, we will say, the Great Lakes—and I believe expressly does permit railroad ownership on the Great Lakes now prohibited by existing legislation. That brings in questions that this House ought to have the right to consider and that are beyond the power of the conferees to bring in. If they can write in these new sections at this stage, they can write in anything they please. [Applause.]

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, the Chair will recall the history of this legislation. In the first place, a bill passed the Senate and came to the House which revised the whole Interstate Commerce Act, including the Panama Canal Act, referred to by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND]. The House struck out the entire Senate bill and wrote a substitute. The bill which passed the House covered this subject in subsections 15 and 16, on page 217 and page 218 of the bill as it passed the House. The only change made in conference was in the clarification of the language of these two sections. The law remains substantially as it is in the existing law under these two sections. There is a change, a clarifying change, but the substantial language involved in the bill today was in the bill when it passed the House. The subject was also covered in the Senate bill. What we have here is a clarification made since this bill passed the House, and that has been agreed on by the conferees, which involved in working on the two bills that covered the whole question of our transportation laws.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will permit the Chair to interrupt, is there anything in the original House bill with reference to this provision affecting the Panama Canal?

Mr. LEA. Yes, indeed. That is what I refer to. Those provisions were amended by the Senate bill and by the House bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. And is it not true that the House bill did undertake to amend a part of the Interstate Commerce Act that had to do with the Panama Canal?

Mr. LEA. It did. That was in both bills.

Mr. RAYBURN. And the House bill was substituted for the whole Senate bill. In other words, the House Committee struck out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and substituted an entirely new bill, which dealt with the only section of the Interstate Commerce Act which has to do with the Panama Canal.

Mr. LEA. That is true.

Mr. BLAND. That dealt with the section that has to do with the Panama Canal, but was there anything in the original bill that dealt with the specific questions now embraced in this bill?

Mr. LEA. The gentleman from California is claiming nothing for himself from the standpoint of parliamentary law, but I do say that the House bill amended all three of the paragraphs under discussion and reads in substance that these paragraphs are amended to read as follows. The very language we start out with referring to July 1914 is a direct quotation from the Panama Canal Act.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. Yes.

Mr. HALLECK. Is it not true that under the rules, under a motion to recommit and send the bill back to conference, the whole bill was again in conference even as it was in conference when we first entered into a conference with the Senate?

Mr. LEA. I understand that to be the rule. The fact that we brought in a report that was not approved lays the whole matter open to further conference.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask the gentleman, in the interest of clarity, to turn to subparagraph 16, found on page 14 of the conference report, and say to the House whether that paragraph 16 as now written does not confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission a new power, not contained now in the law, and I call the attention of the gentleman to the language of it.

Mr. LEA. I think not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I quote:

Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (14), the Commission shall have authority—to authorize the operation and leasing of a vessel by a railroad on the Great Lakes and the inland waterways, that being the effect of it. Does that authority reside now in existing law?

Mr. LEA. I think it does.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the gentleman sure?

Mr. LEA. Section 5 of the present law provides jurisdiction—is hereby conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine questions of fact as to the competition or possibility of competition, after full hearing, on the application of any railroad company or other carrier. Such application may be filed for the purpose of determining whether any existing service is in violation of that section * * * and pray for an order permitting the continuance of any vessel or vessels already in operation, or for the purpose of asking an order to install new service not in conflict with the provisions of this paragraph.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. LEA. Will the gentleman just permit me to continue for a moment? This question came up 17 years ago and the Interstate Commerce Commission rendered its decision, which has not been appealed from and has exercised the power that we provide for in this section in question. Nobody claims that the Commission has abused its power for any improper purpose.

The substance of the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission is as follows:

New water service. The same consideration of advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people which applies to the continuance of an existing service applies equally to the installation of a new service, and under this paragraph the Commission may not only extend the time during which a service by water may be continued, but it may grant authority to install a new service. It is not apparent from this section that it was the intention of Congress to permit the continuance of an existing line, and at the same time to prohibit the further development of service when traffic offered warrants, and it is in the public interest.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. In connection with the inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that the bill now under consideration does very materially repeal at least a part of the Panama Canal Act of 1914, permit me to call attention to a case decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission, found in Thirty-third Interstate Commerce Commission Reports, page 699, on the application of the Great Lakes line. On that application the Interstate Commerce Commission, among other things, made the following announcement:

> These boat lines, under control of petitioner railroads, have been first a sword and then a shield.

In the said case, under the Panama Canal Act of 1914, the Interstate Commerce Commission denied authority to the petitioning railroads in 1915, shortly after the act was passed, that would enable them to acquire competing water lines on the Great Lakes. As stated by the gentleman from New York, under the provisions of the conference report, that authority for the first time, although efforts have been made to repeal the Panama Canal Act for 25 years, would be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The SPEAKER. These suggestions, while interesting, in the opinion of the Chair do not bear upon the point of order under consideration.

The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEA. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that this section 16 completely revolutionizes congressional and governmental theory of competition in the transportation field?

Mr. LEA. No; it does not. The basis of action by the Interstate Commerce Commission is exactly the same as it is under the Panama Canal Act. The Commission must be convinced that the competition will not be decreased by the consolidation or purchase, and that the operation is in the public welfare.

Mr. CULKIN. In other words, the gentleman wishes to say that if the Interstate Commerce Commission so finds, it does revolutionize governmental and congressional theory of competition in transportation?

Mr. LEA. I did not quite understand what the gentleman said.

Mr. CULKIN. I asked the gentleman if it is not a fact that if the Interstate Commerce Commission, which some people are evil enough to say is railroad-minded, finds a certain state of facts under this section, it does revolutionize congressional and governmental theory on competition in the transportation field?

Mr. LEA. No; I think not. The power that the Commission has exercised for 17 years is the same as in this language that is written here today. The substance of it is rewritten for clarification.

Mr. CULKIN. What do you mean by striking out the word "elsewhere" in that section? What does that mean?

Mr. LEA. It means that the main act applies to the Panama Canal Act.

Mr. CULKIN. Inland waterways and coastal waterways?

Mr. LEA. The rule as to the Panama Canal is not affected here.

Mr. CULKIN. I understand that.

Mr. LEA. It is only as to other places that are affected by the language.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that the effect is to create a monopoly of transportation and hand it over to the railroads?

Mr. LEA. No, indeed. That can be done only after proper evidence furnished the Commission to support an order of approval.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard very briefly on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, this is an important question, raised rather hurriedly. There is no doubt whatever that, in the report of the conferees, we have not abused the very broad discretionary power which is vested in us as managers, under the rules of this House, where all after the enacting clause is stricken and an entirely new bill is substituted.

Even in the case where legislation is returned to conference under specific instructions as is the case before us, the managers are permitted to disregard such instructions if they care to, in the interest of reporting the bill back in form acceptable to the Members of the House.

Even a casual reading of the authorities is sufficient to support this well-known rule. I call the Speaker's attention, however, to paragraph 546 of Jefferson Manual, Rules and Practices of the House of Representatives, and the authorities listed therein.

Mr. Speaker, without tiring the chair with many references, I think the committee can rest upon the authority of Speaker Gillett when, in a similar situation, page 12711 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 15, 1922, the Speaker ruled in this language:

> This case does not rest simply on the Chair's opinion, but there is a decision by a Speaker whose opinion carries as much authority, probably, as that of anybody who has even been in the chair, Speaker Carlisle. In a decision cited in Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, section 6395, he went even further than it is necessary for the Chair to go now. He went so far as to say that if the House conferees disobeyed the instructions of the House, still the report is not on that account subject to a point of order. Of course, the House is not bound to agree to it and probably would not agree with its conferees if they so acted, but, as Speaker Carlisle said, the conferees are partly from the House and partly from the Senate. They are there to come to an agreement, and the House conferees, of course, are subject, and feel themselves subject to the orders of the House, but if they disobey it and come back, it is not subject to a point of order, but it is subject to review by the House.

The foregoing decision by Speaker Gillett, under paragraph 541 of Jefferson Manual, Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives, and a hurried reading thereof suggests that in this decision handed down by Speaker Gillett in 1922 in which he adopted the rule that although managers may disregard instructions, their report may not for that reason be ruled out of order. He confirmed previous decisions upholding the same rule by former Speakers. I am sorry I have not had the time to go into a more detailed study of these decisions but I am sure they are most familiar to our distiguished Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, in returning this important bill, the only change of any consequence with which some Members might find fault is the elimination of the Wadsworth amendment. All other changes are clarifying in nature. No one can read what the conferees have done in this matter without coming to the conclusion that we have not injected anything into this legislation beyond that which the rules permit. [Applause.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like just briefly to mention the fact that during the incumbency of the present Speaker a ruling was had on the Farm Act of 1938, when a very similar situation arose after the House had adopted on entire substitute for the Senate bill. In that instance, if I remember correctly, the report was permitted to go to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule upon the several points of order submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND]. The Chair in ruling upon these points of order will consider them en bloc because they either raise the question that the conferees have violated the instructions given them by the House of Representatives or that the conferees in reporting this bill have included new matter that was not germane to the text of either the Senate or the House bill.

The decision of the Chair on this question is predicated, of course, upon the showing made by the record that when this bill came over from the Senate the House committee and the House itself in subsequently passing the bill struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause and substituted an entirely new bill. This is not a new question, although the Chair has not had the opportunity fully to consider all of the precedents. It is clearly one, from the precedents which the Chair will cite, that has been fully considered and determined by former Speakers of the House, and the Chair has not been presented with, nor has the Chair been able to lay his hands upon, any decision that goes contrary to these precedents.

Mr. Speaker Clark, as reported in section 3248, volume VIII, of Cannon's Precedents, rendered a decision upon which the following syllabus is based:

The Speaker may not rule out of order a conference report as in contravention of instructions imposed on the managers.

Where one House has amended a bill of the other by striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting a new text, the conferees have the entire subject before them and may report any germane bill.

Inasmuch as the bill covered by the pending conference report undertakes to cover the whole question of transportation in all of its phases, it is apparent to the Chair with reference to the changes that were made in the conference report that they certainly were germane to the general subject of the entire provisions of the bill.

The Chair reads the following from the precedent he has just cited:

On June 12, 1917, the House was considering the conference report on the bill (H. R. 3673) amending the Federal Reserve Act, when Mr. PAT HARRISON, of Mississippi, made the point of order that the conferees had violated instructions imposed on them on May 10, as follows:

"That the managers on the part of the House be instructed to agree in conference to the substance of the following provision in the Senate amendment:

"'Provided, Such nonmember bank or trust company maintains with the Federal Reserve bank of its district a balance sufficient to offset the items in transit held for its account by the Federal Reserve bank: Provided further, That nothing in this or any other section of this act shall be construed as prohibiting a member or nonmember bank from making reasonable charges, in no case to exceed 10 cents per $100 or fraction thereof based on the total of checks and drafts presented at any one time, for collection or payment of checks and drafts and remission therefor by exchange or otherwise.'"

Mr. HARRISON charged that the conferees instead of reporting the two provisos in the form in which directed had substituted for them this provision:

That nothing in this or any other section of this act shall be construed as prohibiting a member or nonmember bank from making reasonable charges to be determined and regulated by the Federal Reserve Board. But no such charges shall be made against the Federal Reserve bank—

Thus changing the Federal Reserve Board from an agency of administrative capacity to one of judicial capacity and giving them the power to determine the reasonableness of rates.

After debate, the Speaker, Champ Clark, of Missouri, ruled:

"The situation is this: The Senate struck out everything after the enacting clause of the House bill. It has been decided so many times that it is hardly necessary to repeat it, that where that is done a very wide discretion is given to the conferees, even to the bringing in of an entirely new bill. Of course, such new bill would have had to be on the same subject.

"The transactions in regard to conference reports are divided into two parts—what the House can do and what the Speaker can do. On the 23d day of June 1812, 105 years ago, Mr. Speaker Henry Clay laid down the limits of what conferees can do so clearly that his ruling has been followed ever since. The conferees cannot go outside of what is submitted to them and lug in entirely new matter and new questions. They are always trying to do it. As the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mondell] suggests, it is a very serious proposition for the Speaker to refuse to rule out a conference report in the last days of the session, and it is a very serious question for him to rule it out. The Chair did so twice in the last days of a session on very important bills, but both were clear cases. The Chair did it with a great deal of reluctance, but it had to be done under the universal practice.

"The Speaker has not a thing to do in passing upon the question of whether the conferees did or did not comply with the instructions of the House. That question is for the House to decide. That has been decided. I do not know how many times, but several times, and the Chair decided it once himself. That was the reason my opinion in that case was so short. The Chair did not elaborate it, for the House was busy, and it had been decided that way several times, and he simply followed the old ruling.

"The leading case is found in section 6395 of Hinds' Precedents. The opinion was written by Mr. Speaker Carlisle. He was a great man and a great Speaker. The headline of Mr. Speaker Carlisle's decision was written by Asher C. Hinds, construing Mr. Speaker Carlisle's opinion. It is not any secret with people who have been around here any considerable length of time that Mr. Hinds probably knew more about parliamentary law than any other man that ever lived. He knew more than the Speakers whom he advised, and they were great Speakers. He had made it the study of his life. Here is what Mr. Hinds said, and then I will read what Mr. Speaker Carlisle said.

The Speaker then read section 6395 of Hinds' Precedents, and concluded:

"It seems to the Chair that that opinion is as clear as crystal. This is a matter for the House to decide. The point of order is overruled, and the House has the conference report before it. If the House does not like the conference report, it can vote it down. That is its remedy."

In other words, at the proper stage in the proceedings on this conference report, after the previous question has been ordered, if it is ordered on the adoption of the conference report, the Members making these points of order, or any other Member, may, in addition to the opportunity to vote down the conference report, have the right to offer a motion to recommit this entire bill to the conferees.

Mr. Nicholas Longworth, when Speaker, following that decision in principle, held, as shown section 3266, volume VIII, of Cannon's Precedents, page 751—and the Chair quotes the syllabus:

Where an entire bill has been stricken out and a new text inserted, the conferees exercise broad authority and may discard language occurring both in the bill and the substitute. On January 29, 1927, the House proceeded to the consideration of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 9971) for the regulation of radio communications.

Mr. Tom D. McKeown, of Oklahoma, made the point of order that the conferees had stricken out matter agreed to by both Houses.

The Speaker said:

The Chair thinks he can simplify this situation by ruling with reference to the points of order that, inasmuch as the Senate struck out the entire House bill and inserted a bill of its own, any amendment which was germane is in order. The Chair will quote the precedent from Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, section 6421, as follows:

"The Chair understands that the Senate adopted a substitute for the House bill. If the two Houses had agreed upon any particular language or any part of a section, the committee of conference could not change that; but the Senate having stricken out the bill of the House and inserted another one, the committee of conference have the right to strike out that and report a substitute in its stead. Two separate bills have been referred to the committee, and they can take either one of them, or a new bill entirely, or a bill embracing parts of either. They have a right to report any bill that is germane to the bills referred to them."

The Chair thinks that is the better practice, and it has been universally followed in the House, that where the Senate strikes out the entire House bill and substitutes one of its own, it is in order for the conferees to recommend the adoption of any provision that is germane. That ruling will cover all amendments.

There are a number of other decisions that conform to and confirm these decisions I have read in making this ruling. Of course, decisions of the Chair never reflect the individual views necessarily of the occupant of the chair, but in order that there may be continuity and consistency in the rulings of various Speakers of the House it is absolutely necessary and essential that whoever the Speaker may be he must in substance, unless he can find some very sound reasons for departing from them, hold to the precedents and decisions that have been well considered by former Speakers of the House and which have been embodied in what might be called the law of precedents governing not only the Speaker but the membership of this body.

In view of the decisions read, the Chair feels constrained to overrule the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the two points of order made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] is now recognized for 1 hour and 20 minutes.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON] one-half of the time allotted in this debate. It is understood on both sides that we expect to recognize Members for and against the proposal.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, the conferees have given to this bill a large part of more than 1 year of study and consideration. Today we come before you bringing a conference report which all Members except one in the Senate have signed, proposing that we write the conference agreement into law. We believe we are presenting to you a conference report that deserves the approval of the Members of the House.

One thing apparently that all should consider in connection with this legislation is that it has many ramifications. A great many people have been interested primarily in one particular thing or phase of the legislation that affected them, frequently losing sight of the broader question of the welfare of the United States and its transportation system.

The House instructed the conferees to insist on three amendments that were sent back to conference. We come here with a modification of two of those proposals and a complete rejection of the third. One point I would like to direct your attention to is that in voting the instruction to the conferees, at least three questions were involved. The instruction to the conferees was carried by a comparatively narrow majority in this House. I think it is fair to say that it does not necessarily mean a majority in this House was in favor of any one of the three. However, in coming here today, we believe we have a conference agreement that represents the majority opinion of the House and what the conferees have done, we believe, carries out the will of the House.

The first of these amendments submitted to us was the Jones amendment. Objections were made to the Jones amendment as it was presented to the House before on the basis that it set up an arbitrary rule to determine whether or not agricultural products were entitled to export rates granted industrial products. What we have done in the substitute amendment for the Jones amendment is to declare the policy of Congress to be that agricultural products shall be granted export rates on the same principles as industrial products. We go further than that, and provide that the Commission on its own initiative or on complaint shall make investigation and after hearings make orders to carry out the policy that Congress has here declared and directed the Commission to do.

At this time I am at liberty to say, and I am happy to say, that the Jones amendment as we have written it in this conference agreement has the approval of Mr. JONES, the author of that amendment, and I am satisfied that it accomplishes in a sound way what Mr. JONES desired to accomplish, that is, to secure equal justice to agricultural and industrial products so far as export rates are concerned.

The next amendment concerning which the House instructed us was known as the Harrington amendment. There were certain things involved in the instructions as to this amendment to which I want to call your attention. The first was that the Interstate Commerce Commission should make fair and equitable provisions for employees affected adversely by reason of consolidations or unifications. We had a provision in the original bill that came to the House to that effect and the amendment that we have agreed upon embodies that same provision.

Another provision was that where there is a substitution of transportation, for instance, by truck instead of rail, the employees of the abandoned line should have under those circumstances an order of the Commission fairly protecting their rights against unemployment. That is the only provision that is eliminated in this conference report.

There was a further provision—the instruction as to the Harrington amendment—that the agreement should include conditions so that the transaction will not result in employees being placed in a worse condition with respect to their employment. That provision is written in the conference agreement.

Then there was a provision confirming the right of employees to enter into agreements with railroads to take care of them in case of unemployment as a result of consolidations.

The substitute that we bring in here provides two additional things. First, there is a limitation on the operation of the Harrington amendment for 4 years from the effective date of the order of the Commission approving the consolidation. In other words, the employees have the protection against unemployment for 4 years, but the Commission is not required to give them benefits for any longer period. If the employees themselves make an agreement with the railroad company for a better or a longer period, that is a matter between the railroad men and the railroads, but this 4-year limitation is established by the pending conference agreement.

There is another limitation on the protective benefits afforded by the amendment. The benefit period shall not be required for a longer period than the prior employment of the employee before the consolidation occurred. In other words, under the original Harrington amendment, if a man was employed for 6 months, he would indefinitely be subject to the benefits of the amendment from the railroad company. We have changed that so the railroad company will not be required to maintain him in no worse condition as to his employment for any longer period than he worked before the consolidation occurred.

We believe that is a very fair and a very liberal provision for labor. We believe that railway labor substantially agrees in that viewpoint. We take nothing from labor by this agreement. We simply write specific provisions that shall be in the order of approval of the Commission, but otherwise we do not tie its hands.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Would this 4-year rule have the effect of delaying a consolidation for 4 years, or would it mean that if a consolidation were made there would still be a 4-year period during which the man would be paid?

Mr. LEA. No; this rule does not delay consolidation. It means from the effective date of the order of the Commission the benefits are available for 4 years. The order determines the date, and the protective benefits run 4 years from that date.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. That would be whether or not they were still employed?

Mr. LEA. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As I want to see those who might lose their jobs as a result of consolidation protected, I should like to have the gentleman's interpretation of the phrase that the employee will not be placed in a worse position with respect to his employment. Does "worse position" as used mean that his compensation will be just the same for a period of 4 years, assuming that he were employed for 4 years, as it would if no consolidation were effected?

Mr. LEA. I take that to be the correct interpretation of those words. Our conference agreement followed the instructions of the House in that respect. It gives railway labor generous protection against sudden and long unemployment.

To proceed to the Wadsworth amendment. The Wadsworth amendment, as you know, places a floor under freight rates. There is a similarity to the wage and hour bill in that here we have a floor below which rates should not go with the permission of the Commisssion in its control of the freight-rate structure. The amendment would deprive the Commission of the discretion it ordinarily has in making rates. Ordinarily the Commission considers the value of the freight, the value of the service, the high or low cost of the freight, the conditions under which it must be transported, the effect on the movement of traffic, and so forth. The Wadsworth amendment deprives the Commission of authority to exercise that discretion.

I wish to say in the beginning with reference to the Wadsworth amendment that it is a provision that has been considered, so my information is, in every transportation country in the world for years gone by, and in every place in the world where there is rail transportation it has been rejected as impracticable and undesirable. So far as my time will permit I believe I can point out some of the objections.

Here is a situation that you must recognize to begin with. We have an average cost of freight in this country. Much of it is hauled below that cost. Much freight is above that average cost.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 additional minutes.

The Wadsworth amendment states that the Commission shall permit the freight to be placed at a certain elevation. It must be compensatory, and in addition to that it must cover overhead and all elements of cost. That means overhead, including taxes. Without including any return on the investment we have this situation. Assume that the figure 100 involves what the Wadsworth amendment states shall be included, compensation, including overhead, and it would carry taxes. The statistics show that in this country the average cost of transportation would be less than 80 percent of the Wadsworth standard, that is, what is rated as transportation cost. The additional costs are necessary, of course, for overhead and taxes.

There is much freight at the present time that is carried as low as 80, under 100, because of competitive conditions or because it will not move at a higher freight rate. Cheap freight—low-grade freight like grain, fertilizer, sand and gravel, and building materials—must move at that lower level on a narrow margin or they do not move at all. Therefore the effect of the Wadsworth amendment would be to require this 100-percent instead of the 80-percent floor on which the freight-rate structure is founded.

The effect of this amendment, if put into practical effect and enforced, would be to raise the freight rates on a large portion of the heavy commerce of the United States. There is nothing unusual about that practice. In this country there is the greatest need of cheap transportation of any place in this world because of the wide spread of the country and the great productive centers we have scattered throughout the Nation.

The high-cost freight, the high-priced freight, makes possible the low-cost freight in the United States. For instance, here is a passing train. One car is loaded with building materials. The railroad hauls that at a very low margin. Next to that car is a car full of merchandise, dry goods. The car that is loaded with dry goods probably pays $200 for the trip, while the car loaded with building material pays $100. The high price that is charged for the higher grade freight makes it possible for the railroad to make something for carrying the low-grade freight. It carries the low-grade freight at a very minimum of profit, but its income is something above what it would have been had it not carried that freight.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman not explain to the Members that this amendment will also raise passenger rates?

Mr. LEA. Yes. Passengers in the United States are carried at a loss of $100,000,000 a year. If the Wadsworth amendment were put into effect the railroads would, theoretically, have to recover that $100,000,000 by higher fares, which they could not do. It would simply mean that the rates would be raised and we would have less traffic on the railroads and less income.

I have touched only a few of the objections to the Wadsworth amendment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have addressed the House upon this subject upon a former occasion and therefore I am somewhat hesitant about doing it again. I may make this observation, however, at the outset, while I have no doubt that the ruling of the Speaker conforms with the precedents of the House, I cannot escape the conclusion that as a result of those precedents instructions given to conferees by a majority vote of the House are but idle gestures and need not be indulged in in the future. They are not binding in any sense.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that the distinguished majority leader so stated when that amendment was originally adopted, having been adopted by the Senate and the House, there was not any escape from including it in the final draft of the act?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; the gentleman from Texas, when the bill was originally before the House, stated that if this amendment was adopted it did not go to conference where they might have an opportunity to iron it out, that when it is adopted here it is the law unless the President of the United States happens to veto it.

That is all there is to be said. The House has directed its conferees to do a certain thing, they have not done so, and since we have no control over them at all, we might just as well admit it. I make these observations in the hope that some one skilled in parliamentary law will give some consideration to amending the conference rules.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word about the so-called Wadsworth amendment. I need not recite it to you that it was adopted by both Houses. It is interesting to note that in the debate in the Senate, when the Senator from Arkansas, Senator MILLER, offered it, it contained an additional paragraph to which the Senator from Montana, Senator WHEELER, objected, and he stated in the debate that if that paragraph was eliminated from Senator MILLER's amendment, he would accept the remainder. That paragraph was eliminated and the Senator from Montana said he had no objection to it and accepted the Miller amendment. It passed the Senate thus unanimously. Well, it is out.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman tell us who was the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Senator WHEELER, the chairman of the committee.

It was accepted and put in by both Houses, but it is out, so here we are.

Now just for a moment let me discuss the merits of the amendment. I regard it, incidentally, as the one hope of the water carriers in this bill. Without it I fear their days are numbered.

My good friend the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] addressed a letter to the Members of the House, or a good number of them, under date of August 7, urging them to oppose the amendment, and in the letter he used this language, and he used language somewhat like it just a few minutes ago:

> The Wadsworth amendment sets up an arbitrary minimum-rate rule that, if enforced, would increase the rates on a large percentage of low-cost material that now moves at lower rates.

For the life of me I cannot see any arbitrary rate rule in the Wadsworth amendment. There is none. Let us see how it reads:

> In order that the public at large may enjoy the benefit and economy afforded by each type of transportation, the Commission shall permit each type of carrier to reduce rates so long as such rates retain a compensatory return—

And so forth. Is there an arbitrary minimum-rate rule in any such amendment? I cannot see it. It provides, in effect, that if a carrier of any type comes to the Commission and demonstrates to the Commission that it can carry a certain kind of material from one point to another at a lower rate than the rates it has been charging, and still get compensation from it, the Commission shall let them do it.

There is nothing arbitrary in the fixing of a floor. The gentleman from North Carolina says the Wadsworth amendment puts a floor under rates. I can see no floor fixed. It does make more elastic and more feasible, as I see it, the lowering of a rate when the lower rate is compensatory.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HALLECK. Is it fair to say that the inclusion of the language of the gentleman's amendment in the act would prevent any carrier from putting into effect a wage lower than that that would be sufficient to meet the full allocated cost of the performance of that service, including profits?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Hereafter; yes.

Mr. HALLECK. Does the gentleman contend that it is an inflexible rule? Does the gentleman contend that the application of that rule would not result in the raising of rates all over this country—rates that are now lower than the full allocated cost, including profit, rates that have to do with an amount above the out-of-pocket cost, that are established and put into effect in order that traffic can move?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not so concede. This provides for applications for reductions, not increases.

Mr. HALLECK. But if they wanted to apply for a lower one, the wording of the amendment is that no rate can be put into effect if it does not include the full allocated cost and it was offered, if I understood the amendment, merely for that purpose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me read from a letter which I prepared in reply to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA]:

> The amendment merely provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall permit a carrier to reduce rates so long as those rates are compensatory. Its purpose is to prevent arbitrary rate increases being imposed upon low-cost carriers in order to benefit their high-cost competitors. While it clearly indicates that the Congress does not approve of widespread below-cost rates being used to destroy competition, it contains nothing which would or could be construed as requiring that all rates bear the same proportionate share of over-all expenses. There has never come to my attention any meritorious criticism of the amendment or of the purpose it seeks to accomplish—the protection of the shipping public in their enjoyment of low-cost transportation.

That is the purpose of this amendment. It is not arbitrary, it does not fix a minimum, it does not fix a maximum. It opens the door to lower rates where they are justifiable, and I know, of course, that there are certain elements in the transportation industry that do not want lower rates for the benefit of their competitors.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes:

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Is there anything in the law now which would prevent the Commission from doing what the Wadsworth amendment provides?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot conceive that there is, or there would not be such a row to prevent this getting in. [Applause.]

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, by authority of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], I call attention to a telegram which I received from him, which reads:

> Circumstances beyond my control will probably prevent my being there [in Washington] on Monday when conference report comes up on Wheeler-Lea bill. My office is trying to secure a pair against it. I still regard it as thoroughly bad legislation, which is not in the interest of public welfare, and trust it will again be defeated. The conferees have violated the instructions of the House by not including the Wadsworth amendment after both bodies had passed this amendment. It is the only possible protection the public will get. I wish someone would explain my unavoidable absence.

Mr. Speaker, I think the Members will generally understand the reasons why the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] is not with us today and join with me in deploring his absence. The conference report rejects the Wadsworth amendment. That amendment was accepted originally in the Senate as the Miller amendment. It was stricken out by the House committee. It was reinserted in the House by an overwhelming majority and was in the bill originally when it was sent to conference. The conferees rejected the provision, although it had been adopted by the Senate and by the House. The conference report in which it was rejected came before the House for adoption. By an overwhelming vote the House directed that the report be recommitted, and directed that the Wadsworth amendment and other amendments be reinserted. The other amendments have been inserted in a modified form, but the Wadsworth amendment has been entirely omitted. It has again been rejected in violation of the instructions of the House.

I wish particularly to call attention to the circumstances incident to the rejection of this amendment. The amendment itself protects the public and constitutes the principal, if not the only, protection given the public. It says that rates shall not be reduced below a rate that is compensatory. That amendment is rejected. There is written for the first time into the bill a provision expressly giving the Commission the power to destroy the waterways of the inland waters of the United States and of the Great Lakes if they so desire. The railroads are permitted to own them. It appears that there is, I will not say a conspiracy, but a subtle desire to strike down all opposition to the railroads and to create such a situation that the railroads may control it. A policy established many years past after careful consideration is to be destroyed without committee consideration, without consideration by the Senate or House, but in the mandate of the conferees.

Waterway transportation exists for the public. The cheaper transportation exists for the public. The question involved here is not a question of waterway transportation; it is not a question of railroad transportation; but it is the broader question of the right of the public to have their goods transported at the cheapest rate at which goods may be transported. That issue has been clearly brought before the House. I wish to emphasize the fact that the effect in rejecting the Wadsworth amendment to destroy waterway transportation is increased by the new language that is written into the bill for railroad ownership of the waterways. I am going to ask the House in protection, not of the waterways, not of the railroads, but in the protection of the public of America, to send the bill back. Please observe that when the Jones amendment was before us formerly, when other amendments were here, they were said by the conferees to be unworkable and impracticable. The conferees said it would be impossible to enforce any such provisions. But for the purpose of winning the votes of the agricultural interests and of the labor interests, the conferees have found a practical way to include the Jones and Harrington amendments formerly denounced as unworkable. I ask you to reject the conference report and direct the conferees to find a practical way of carrying the Wadsworth amendment into effect. [Applause.]

Pursuant to leave given me to extend and revise my remarks, I desire to call attention to some other matters.

The trouble with the report and with this whole bill is that the conferees have lived and served so many years in a railroad atmosphere and heard the troubles of the railroads adroitly presented by their special pleaders that they have unconsciously magnified those troubles and attributed them to causes contributing in but small, if any, degree to their plight in the years of depression. The result is that the conferees seek to correct the railroad evils in a manner which will destroy competition whereas the primary source of the railroad difficulties may be found, first, in their own practices and, second, in the strait jacket fixed upon them by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

What is the Wadsworth amendment, and what does it do? It provides that:

> In order that the public at large may enjoy the benefit and economy afforded by each type of transportation, the Commission shall permit each type of carrier or carriers to reduce rates so long as such rates maintain a compensatory return to the carrier or carriers for the service rendered: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall be construed so as to affect the long-and-short-haul provision of section 4.

The amendment protects the public. It is expressly predicated upon the interest of the public. It says:

> In order that the public at large may enjoy the benefit and economy afforded by each type of transportation—

And so forth. It expressly directs that the public at large shall be taken into consideration, and provides that rates may be lowered to that end, but when these rates are lowered, the Commission must see to it that the type of carrier lowering its rates shall "maintain a compensatory return to the carrier or carriers after taking into consideration overhead and all other elements entering into the cost to the carrier or carriers for the service rendered."

The prohibition to maintain a compensatory return prohibits such a lowering by one carrier of rates as will destroy a competitor if the rates thus permitted do not maintain a compensatory return. The public at large should have the benefit of that kind of service which will give it—the public—maximum transportation at minimum cost. The conferees should have in contemplation always the best interest of the public.

The persistent defiance by the conferees of the will of the Senate and of the House on this important amendment is conclusive of the philosophy underlying this legislation. The conferees are men of high integrity, but so thoroughly imbued with the railroad psychology and so completely dominated with railroad views that they fail to see the benefits of other types of transportation.

In speeches made by me on April 16, 1940, and on May 9, 1940, I tried to point out many reasons why this legislation should not pass. I shall not undertake to repeat those arguments now, but I shall summarize them briefly:

First. The fundamental differences between different kinds of water carriers are such that legislation should recognize these differences and provide adequate safeguards to protect the public interest.

The economic principles involved in various types of carriers, including the various types of water carriers, are so vastly different that any regulation which does not recognize the fundamental differences between them is bound to be a failure. Any attempt to apply the same rules of regulation to a barge line on the Mississippi River as to a coastwise or intercoastal line would be just as bad as to attempt to regulate the coastwise and intercoastal lines in accordance with the railroad rule book.

Second. The coastwise and intercoastal water carriers are already subjected to ample regulation by a Federal agency—the United States Maritime Commission—which is acquainted with their problems, which understands their operations, and which knows their difficulties. The proposed law, so far as water carriers are concerned, shifts the regulation from an agency which understands their problems and transfers the regulation to an agency which does not understand their problems but has been identified throughout its history with the interests of their competitors.

The proper approach to a coordination of the activities of both should be through the cooperation of existing agencies and not by the destruction of one agency as a regulating medium with the transfer of its authority to the other agency whose functions have always been identified with one of the competitors.

There is no more justification for the transfer of authority over the water carriers to the Interstate Commerce Commission than there would be for the transfer of authority over the railroads to the United States Maritime Commission.

Third. The differences between rail transportation and water transportation are so basic and vital that any attempt to apply the same statutory rules of regulation to both must necessarily produce inequality instead of equality. The attempt to cut a steamship cloak from a railroad pattern will prove disastrous to some types of water carriers, and resembles an attempt to regulate clocks and watches according to instructions issued for the regulation of aircraft engines.

Fourth. Delays ordinarily incident to the settlement of discrimination cases involving railroads would be destructive to water lines with their limited capital and limited service, whereas the railroads' interests are so much more diversified, its field of operation so much more extended, and its sources of revenue so much more numerous that they are able to survive a long fight. In such a contest the railroads could easily strangle their competitors. In self-defense the water carriers must yield or transfer their operations to other streams, with the result that the public, whom they serve, would suffer.

Fifth. The flexibility of water transportation will be destroyed by reason of the time and expense necessarily involved in acquiring the certificates of convenience and necessity required by the proposed law. Elasticity of service by water lines is of tremendous benefit to the shipping public and should be preserved.

Sixth. Procedural delays of a year or more incidental to railroad regulation in reaching a decision affecting railroads may literally bankrupt water lines. The Interstate Commerce Commission takes years to decide a railroad case. This delay would mean the death of water carriers. The experience of water carriers to date in their dealings with the Commission on railroad water rates and decisions show that these dangers exist. The railroads know that this result will follow and they seek to profit by it.

Seventh. Railroad carriers may easily discriminate in favor of one water carrier against a competing water carrier and drive the latter out of existence. If the injured line should seek redress from the Interstate Commerce Commission, the formal procedure at present in force with the Commission would delay a decision for months and sometimes for years. If the conferees in rewriting the bill had desired to protect the water carriers and the public, they should have placed the burden of justifying discriminations on the railroads where the burden belongs. They failed to do this, and thus again made it obvious that the bill as drawn is in the interest of the railroads and not of the public or their competitors.

Eighth. The proposed legislation contains a very real danger in attempting to apply the rules and technique of railroad regulations to water-line cases with the result that the development of water transportation will be discouraged if not destroyed.

Ninth. The public, water carriers, and railroads can be protected and the advantage of all promoted by the passage of H. R. 4307, now pending on the House Calendar. That bill would extend the regulatory jurisdiction of the Maritime Commission to common carriers by water engaged in interstate transportation on inland waters, and the system for the regulation of water carriers would be rounded out and made national in scope. The bill, H. R. 4307, provides a means to effect coordination in the regulation of carriers subject to the Maritime Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission where there is competition between such carriers. This would provide a tested and workable plan of regulation and one that is not unduly restrictive or burdensome. The machinery provided in the bill H. R. 4307 would easily dispose of the small number of cases which would not be disposed of by voluntary arrangements, negotiations, and cooperation between the two Commissions.

The speech which I delivered in the House on April 16, 1940, discusses at greater length the objections I have mentioned above, but there are other insuperable objections to the legislation which I pointed out in my speech of May 9, 1940, and which I shall summarize by a continuation of the above objections.

Tenth. The bill as prepared by the conferees provides the means whereby the railroads may destroy competing carriers. This is contained in the form of a proviso added to each part of the bill, rail, motor and carrier, whereby it is declared in a proviso to each part that the prohibition against discriminations which is contained in the bill, I quote: "shall not be construed to apply to discrimination, prejudice, or disadvantage to the traffic of any other carrier."

The language quoted constitutes an open, legislative invitation by Congress to the stronger form of transportation to destroy its competitor, and obviously operates to the advantage of rail transportation which has a larger field of noncompetitive traffic. The railroads are invited to lower their competitive rates to a point where they may destroy their competitors, and they may do so since they are no longer restrained by the language of the Miller-Wadsworth amendment which the conferees have rejected. The railroads have the ability because of size and financial strength to engage in cutthroat, destructive competition for long periods of time. They can place high rates on noncompetitive traffic, composed in large part of agricultural products, and recoup in that way their revenue losses from reduced rates on competitive traffic. They can proceed to discriminate without restriction, and in fact they have a legislative invitation to discriminate to the destruction of their competitors with the congressional assurance that nothing shall be done about it.

Eleventh. The proposed legislation contains a direction to the Commission in connection with the division between carriers of the proceeds of the joint rail and water movements to divide the revenues between the carriers, not on the basis of their respective costs in relation to the service rendered, not on the basis of the service rendered by each, but on the basis of total operating expenses, taxes on a fair return on the property employed in the service, and in addition on the basis of, I quote: "importance to the public of transportation service of each carrier." This last basis would enable the Commission to disregard every other factor, and fix the division upon the basis of whatever the Commission may think as to the importance to the public of the respective carriers.

Twelfth. Inland waterways were developed by direction of this Congress in the 1920's in order to hold the rail monopoly in check in the interest of the producer and the consumer, and to that end coastwise and intercoastal water transportation was regulated and inland waterways developed with the objective of maintaining and providing a domestic system of efficient low-cost transportation. This wholesome national policy will be thrown overboard if this pending conference report is adopted.

Thirteenth. The proposed legislation forever removes the possibilities and potentialities of improving water-transportation facilities and extending the benefits of low-cost transportation facilities to aid consumers and producers. This is accomplished through the imposition of the requirements for certificates and permits under which only existing water facilities are protected. Experience with the Motor Carriers Act of 1935 has demonstrated that the facilities of water carriers will be restricted to those necessary to take care of existing needs, and the possibilities of development in the future will be wholly ignored.

Fourteenth. The proposed bill provides a Board of Investigation to help to determine what the policies of administration in respect to the various types of transportation shall be in the future after providing effective means for the destruction of agencies competing with the railroads in the present.

The appropriate approach would be to investigate before destroying, and that could be accomplished by delaying this bill until the conclusion of the investigation which the conferees desire.

It is in the interest of the public that consideration of the proposed changes be deferred and particularly at the present moment when it appears that all of the transportation facilities will be taxed to the utmost.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON].

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, an entirely different situation obtains today with respect to the situation of the railways in this country from that which obtained when the study that resulted in the consideration of the bill was begun 2 years ago. I am advised that the income of railways for the first 6 months of the present year has increased 46 percent.

Inland waterway traffic was inaugurated to supplement railway transportation during the first World War. There is room for all modes and methods of transportation, whether by rail, by airway, highway, or waterway, at the present time. It is my view, Mr. Speaker, that the Wadsworth amendment would not only have authorized the waterways, for a compensatory return, to reduce their rates, but at the same time it would have prevented the railways from unduly reducing their rates under the "added traffic" theory and thus destroying water competition.

But I rose to call attention to an entirely new matter that has been incorporated in the second conference report that was not incorporated in the first conference report. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], stated that there was a reference in the bill that passed the House, and a similar reference in the Senate bill, to the Panama Canal Act, and that the purpose of the provision in the present bill with respect to the Panama Canal Act was to clarify existing law. He read to us not a decision, not an excerpt from a decision, but from a note to the case of Southern Pacific Railroad Co. (77 I. C. C. 124, p. 1411, vol. 2, Interstate Commerce Acts, Annotated) in support of his contention, that by inserting the word "new" in this pending bill, or the equivalent of it, the language of the act of 1912, the Panama Canal Act, was perfected and clarified.

Now we have before us in the pending bill the provisions of the Panama Canal Act. In a word, the Panama Canal Act of 1912 prevented railway carriers from acquiring competing water carriers through the Panama Canal and elsewhere, as was pointed out by the gentleman fom Virginia, Judge BLAND, when he read previously during this debate the provision of the act. I want to call attention to a significant statement and call attention of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], to the fact that in clarifying he has left out that word "elsewhere," and that his clarification, whether he has given full force and effect to the language of the pending report or not, repeals the Panama Canal Act insofar as prohibiting railways from acquiring competing water carriers on the Great Lakes and on the inland waterways is concerned.

I submit this question to the chairman: If it be fair and proper to retain existing law for existing or new water carriers with respect to traffic through the Panama Canal, is it not equally fair and just to retain it with respect to the Great Lakes and to the great inland waterways? It may satisfy California to retain the competitive provisions for commerce transported from the Pacific coast through the Panama Canal, but when that law is repealed with respect to the Great Lakes and the great inland waterways of the country, I maintain that it crucifies competition in all those areas adjoining the Great Lakes, along the upper and lower Mississippi River, the Ohio River, and the Missouri River—thus destroying the great inland waterways of this country.

Mr. Speaker, from the beginning we have known that the act would be written in conference. It may be all right to reject that language which the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], during the debate on the bill stated could not be rejected if approved by the Senate, twice approved by the House, the so-called Wadsworth amendment, but it does occur to me that if this were a clarification, to use the language of the distinguished chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], it is passing strange that this clarification was left out of the first conference report submitted to this body on April 26, and it is more than passing strange that it should be embraced in the present conference report with the simple statement that it clarifies existing law when in truth and in fact it repeals all competition between the railways and the competing waterways, except through the Panama Canal.

Mr. LEA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I yield to the chairman.

Mr. LEA. I think the gentleman misunderstood my statement with reference to the word "new." The new language I referred to was included in the revised Panama Canal Act of October 1, 1935, which gave the Commission the right to make an order to install new service.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am very glad to yield to the gentleman. I read from the notes to which he referred. I referred in the Southern Pacific case (77 I. C. C. 124), page 1411, as they appeared in volume 2, Interstate Commerce Acts, Annotated, and the gentleman read from the note as to new service and not from the decision in the case.

Mr. LEA. I was reading from the law, in substance.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I understand the text from which the gentleman was reading.

Mr. Speaker, under existing law no competition is prevented, not only in the Panama Canal but in the waterways of the country. Shortly after the act was passed in 1915, application was filed by the railways of the country to take advantage of the existing law and the provision of the law with respect to existing service. I shall read to you the language of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Lake Line application under the Panama Canal Act. This is found in Thirty-third Interstate Commerce Commission, page 699. The decision was handed down May 7, 1915:

These boat lines under the control of the petitioning railroads have been first a sword and then a shield. When these roads succeeded in gaining control of the boat lines which had been in competition with paralleling rails in which they were interested, and later effected their combination through the Lake Line Association, by which they were able to and did drive all independent boats from the through lake-and-rail transportation, they thereby destroyed the possibility of competition with their railroads other than such competition as they were of a mind to permit. Having disposed of rail competition via the Lakes, these boats are now held as a shield against possible competition of new independents. Since it appears from the record that the railroads are able to operate their boat lines at a loss where there is now no competition from independent lines, it is manifest that they could and would operate at a further loss in a rate war against independents. The large financial resources of the owning railroads make it impossible for an independent to engage in a rate war with a boat line so financed.

If you want to give the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to existing or new service authority to do that which they said they had no authority to do under the Panama Canal Act, approve this conference report. If you are opposed to it and stand for competition and reduced rates on heavy traffic borne by the waterways of this country vote to recommit this to the conferees, or vote to reject the report.

I recall the days when the law existed as provided by this conference report, and I recall that Jay Gould, of New York, to eliminate water competition on the Mississippi River, established or acquired lines of boats, naming them after his children. Very shortly thereafter the George Gould, the Anna Gould, and other boat lines that he established or acquired disappeared and the railroads enjoyed a monopoly.

I trust that the motion to be made by the gentleman from New York to instruct the conferees respecting the Wadsworth amendment and the repeal of the Panama Canal Act will be adopted or that this conference report will be rejected. [Applause.]

Under leave to revise and extend, permit me to say that from the beginning I have opposed the provisions of the pending legislation for the regulation of water carriers. I have maintained that it was the purpose of railways to destroy the competition of the waterways.

When the conference report of April 26, 1940, was considered, it was recommitted to the conferees with instructions to embody the Wadsworth, the Jones, and the Harrington amendments.

The conferees submit a second conference report on August 7, 1940, which undertakes to embody substitutes for the Jones and Harrington amendments but it utterly ignores and disregards the instructions of the House respecting the Wadsworth amendment. The Wadsworth amendment is eliminated altogether. The second conference report is identical with the first conference report so far as the Wadsworth amendment is concerned.

As I have previously stated it has been understood from the beginning that the transportation bill would be written in conference, but as was stated by the distinguished majority leader [Mr. RAYBURN] when the Wadsworth amendment was adopted, this amendment would have to be embraced in the bill. The Wadsworth amendment is identical with the language of the Miller amendment adopted in the Senate. Both the Senate and the House have thus agreed upon the Wadsworth amendment.

Surely it is not too much to ask that a provision that has been agreed to by the Senate once and by the House twice should be incorporated in a bill that was rewritten entirely in conference. A regard for the views of the Senate and the House would require that the Wadsworth amendment be embraced. The instructions of the House should not be flouted.

WADSWORTH AMENDMENT

Under the Wadsworth amendment each type of carrier shall be permitted by the Commission to reduce its rates so long as such rates maintain a compensatory return to the carrier, after taking into consideration overhead and other elements entering into the cost to the carrier or carriers for the service rendered.

Under this amendment water carriers would be protected against ruinous and destructive rate-cutting policies of the railroads. The railroads could no longer make rates on the so-called added traffic theory. For this reason the railroads vigorously oppose the amendment.

It may be contended that the proviso of subsection (c) of section 305, page 40 of the the Conference Report, would protect the water carriers; however, a water carrier could reduce its rates but there is no protection whatever to a water carrier against a reduced rate by a railroad even though such railroad rate might be so low as to drive the water carrier out of business.

It may be argued that subsection (f) of section 307 will protect the water carriers. I call attention to the total absence in this last section, or any other section of the bill, of a protection for water carriers against ruinous railway rate reductions.

By omitting the Wadsworth amendment, the water carriers have been deprived of a statutory protection against the establishment of "added traffic" rates. It may be conceded that the Commission has the power to stop those practices if it desires to do so. I insist that there be a statutory instruction, positive and definite, that will protect the waterways.

PANAMA CANAL ACT

The Second Conference Report not only disregards the instructions thrice given respecting the Wadsworth amendment, but to my astonishment it repeals paragraphs in the Panama Canal Act designed to protect the public against a monopoly of transportation by the railroads. Under the Panama Canal Act, in effect since 1914, it was unlawful for a railroad to own or operate a common carrier by water operated through the Panama Canal, or elsewhere. It was thus unlawful to so acquire water carriers on the Great Lakes and the Inland Waterways. In the second Conference Report, the prohibition against acquiring water carriers on the Inland Waterways and the Great Lakes has been repealed. No such repeal was contained in the first Conference Report. Only a passing reference is made to the repeal in the statement of the managers. On page 69 of the statement it is said that the Panama Canal Act has been modified for the purpose of clarification and with respect to the installation of new service. All must agree, however, that the repeal goes very much further than providing for new service. It destroys the competition of existing services. At one fell swoop the Conference Report undertakes to do what Congress has emphatically declined to do for 25 years. Repeated efforts have been made to repeal the prohibition against railways acquiring competing water carriers on the inland waterways and on the Great Lakes. The repeal of the Panama Canal Act will give to the railroads the same power and authority that they had to acquire water carriers prior to the adoption of the Panama Canal Act. Instead of providing for new waterways service, it will eliminate all waterways service.

No consideration was given to the subject in the first conference report. It was not referred to in the debates with respect to recommitting the report. The second report repeals the Panama Canal Act by rewriting its provisions and removing the unconditional prohibition against the acquisition of water carriers by the railroads, and granting complete authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon application of any railroad, to authorize the acquisition by ownership or control, lease, or operation of such water carriers.

The new provision which grants this authority is contained in section 5, paragraph 16, page 14, of the conference report, which, in part, reads as follows:

Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 14 (which contains the Panama Act prohibition) "the Commission shall have authority, upon application of any carrier, as defined in section 1 (3)

(railroads only), and after hearing, by order to authorize such carrier to own or acquire ownership of, to lease or operate, to have or acquire control of, or to acquire an interest in, a common carrier by water, or vessel, not operated through the Panama Canal, with which the applicant does or may compete for traffic."

I can recall the heyday of water traffic on the Mississippi River some 50 years ago. Under the corrupt and cut-throat competition of the railroads it disappeared. The public suffered. Others are familiar with the disappearance of competition following the acquiring of water carriers by the railways on the Great Lakes.

Under the Panama Canal Act in the Lake Line Application case (33 I. C. C. 699, decided May 7, 1915), from which I have already quoted, the Commission pointed out that the competing boat lines acquired by the railways are first a sword with which to destroy competitors, and then they are a shield to destroy competition, for, having acquired them, abandonment follows sooner or later.

WATERWAYS ESSENTIAL IN NATIONAL DEFENSE

In the first World War, additional transportation was needed. Provision was made for the Inland Waterways Service. In the current national-defense program, the railways are among the chief beneficiaries. The pending legislation has been under consideration for 2 years. Whatever may have been the justification for the transportation bill 2 years ago, a different situation obtains at present. For the first 6 months of 1940 the net income of the railroads has increased some 46 percent, as I have stated. I favor aid for the railways, but it is not necessary to destroy the waterways.

DISTRIBUTION

Water transportation on our coasts, Great Lakes, and inland waterways since 1920 has promoted distribution of the products of the farm and factory for the benefit of the producers and growers, as well as the consumers of the country. Lower rates have been promoted. Legislation alone will not solve the difficulties of the railways. The public is entitled to the best and the cheapest transportation. Railways must solve their problems by meeting and not destroying competition. The public is entitled to the inherent benefits of all transportation.

INLAND WATERWAYS DISCRIMINATED AGAINST

It is significant that the conference report repeals competition on the inland waterways and Great Lakes, but does not repeal competition through the Panama Canal. The Great Lakes and the inland waterways are discriminated against. The great interior of the Nation will suffer. The Pacific coast, including the State of California, will receive the benefits of low rates through the Panama Canal, but the States along the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, and the Great Lakes States, in securing outlets for both farms and factories, will be discriminated against. If it is unwise to repeal the competition features respecting water transportation through the Panama Canal, it is unwise to repeal them respecting transportation on the inland waterways and Great Lakes.

CONCLUSION

The motion to recommit with instructions should be adopted or the conference report should be rejected.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, for many months hundreds of thousands of railroad workers throughout the Nation have been anxiously awaiting congressional approval of S. 2009, the Wheeler-Lea railroad bill. They are interested in this bill because it will help their employers, the railroads of this country. Today the 21 brotherhoods representing the railroad workers of this country are united in their support of the conference report on S. 2009 which we are now considering, and plead for its passage by this House.

Much has been said and more will be said about the earnings of the railroads of the country during this temporary boom caused by the heavy expenditures of our Government for national defense. So that the Members of the House will have a true picture of the railroad industry, I want to read a statement that came into my possession this morning, entitled, "Railways in Hands of Receivers and Trustees," as follows:

RAILWAYS IN HANDS OF RECEIVERS AND TRUSTEES

The Bureau of Statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission made public this week a compilation showing steam railways in the hands of receivers and trustees on December 31, 1939, and changes in the list of companies affected by receivership or trusteeship to July 31, 1940. This compilation showed that 107 railways were in the hands of receivers and trustees (excluding switching and terminal companies) on July 31 this year, compared with 108 on December 31, 1939. Of the total number 10 class I and 24 other railways were in charge of receivers on July 31 this year, and 28 class I and 45 other railways were in charge of trustees. The total number in the hands of receivers and trustees at the close of 1939 represented 69,361 miles of road, and an investment in road equipment totaling $6,001,585,750. The capital stock of those railways was $2,299,838,636 and the unmatured funded debt, $2,794,232,519. The percentage of all steam railways in the hands of receivers and trustees, based on miles of road operated, was 31.05 percent.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, the conferees on this bill, for all of whom I have great personal affection, have risen to new heights of parliamentary Hitlerism by writing into this report the repeal of the section relating to the acquisition of competing water lines.

May I say at this point that the waterways of the Nation carry yearly 500,000,000 tons generally at one-tenth the cost of rail transportation. This great saving has a profoundly beneficial effect upon the life of every American. Sometime about 1935 the Sun Oil Co. caused some figures to be gathered which show that if gasoline were transported by rail instead of by water the gasoline would cost 20 cents additional at the pump. That is only one of the savings. The figures on national consumption show something like a saving of $4,000,000,000 a year to the users of gasoline. There are likewise great savings on all other bulk commodities.

All these savings will be wiped out if this conference report becomes law. This amendment now brought in here is a revolutionary step which spells transportation monopoly and resulting economic disaster to the farmer, consumer, and shipper in industry. The proposition, may I say, comes out of a clear sky and is clothed in deceptive language. On page 69 of the conference report the matter is glossed over with weasel words in a fashion that does no credit to the conferees' willingness to take the House into their confidence. I do not believe that the House will act other than that this bill should be sent back to conference and that the subject matter of this provision should be given full and adequate hearings.

May I say again, as I have said here before, that transportation is a matter of vital importance to the well-being of every American and his right to live comfortably should not be destroyed in such manner as is here presented. This is a time when we need an efficient America. This bill puts America in chains.

I urge every patriotic Member, and I know you are all patriotic, including the distinguished but misled members of the conference committee, in the interest of the country to vote down this conference report and send the bill back to the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I sought this limited time in order that I might have inserted in the RECORD, with the consent of the House, a letter from the Midland Cooperative Wholesale Co., a large farmers' cooperative association operating in both Minnesota and Wisconsin, in which it voices its opposition to the bill S. 2009, known as the Wheeler-Lea bill, unless the Miller-Wadsworth amendment is included.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include this letter in the RECORD:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL]?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

AUGUST 12, 1940.

Hon. MERLIN HULL,
Congressman, State of Wisconsin.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am writing you this letter so that you may know as to what our position is on the bill S. 2009, also known as the Wheeler-Lea bill.

We are unalterably opposed to the passage of this bill, if the Miller-Wadsworth amendment is not included in the bill. After the introduction of the original bill into Congress our interest caused us to study the contents. It is very clear to us that the Wadsworth amendment is about the only section of the bill that gives any consideration to the producers and the consumers of the Northwest. I would like to give you a few figures and facts which we believe you would be interested in.

The interest of the general public in the Northwestern States in the costs of transportation is great, because they must find a market for their surplus goods a long distance from home markets. The farmer's realization on his agricultural products is the price the distant market pays, less the cost of transportation to that market. The same rule applies on what light manufacturing exists in the Northwest. The farmer is the largest shipper of out-bound and in-bound freight in the Northwest. On the products he consumes for home or production use he always pays the freight in the final price.

We have studied various domestic markets in the United States with a view to moving farm products by river transportation. Let me give you an example. The all-rail freight rate on locally produced grain at Red Wing, Minn., to Nashville, Tenn., is $10.80 per ton, or 54 cents per hundred pounds. The river-transportation rate on the same product is $3.20 per ton, or 16 cents per hundred pounds. That same situation would apply to many points between the Northwest and various points in the South and East on our inland-waterway system, such as Alabama, Kentucky, Mississippi, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, etc. This widespread differential has been a factor in keeping living costs in these last States high. This same wide differential has helped to produce the break-down of agriculture in the Northwest. It is very clear that there is no relief in sight from any regulated transportation that has one purpose, that of seeking only higher and higher rates.

Let me give you an example on a commodity that the consumer must pay the freight on in the final price. Wisconsin and Minnesota, as you know, are two of the few States in the United States that do not produce coal. It must all be shipped in from the South and East. After the Transportation Act of 1920 was passed in Congress coal rates advanced about 40 percent to the consumer. The retail price of fuel in these two States will average higher than perhaps any two States in the Union where climate demands fuel.

The present all-rail freight rate on lump coal from West Virginia to western Wisconsin and eastern Minnesota points on the upper Mississippi ranges from $5.35 to $5.55 per ton. The river rate on the same complete coal movement is from $3.50 to $3.70 per ton. The retail price on coal in many points in Wisconsin and Minnesota, such as La Crosse, Winona, Red Wing, Prescott, Minneapolis, and St. Paul have already been reduced to the final consumer to the extent of $1 to $2 per ton on account of coal moved into these points by river.

The Northwest is a large consumer of petroleum products. The farmer depends more and more on his tractor and internal-combustion engine. The Mississippi and Ohio River basin has within its reach over 70 percent of the known available oil reserve. The all-rail freight rate on petroleum products from production in and around St. Louis, Mo., to the upper Mississippi by all rail will average over 3 cents per gallon. The rate via river transportation on the same complete movement would be as low as 1 cent per gallon to river cities. Now, in the early stages of the development of the upper Mississippi several large oil companies started moving petroleum products by river. The increase in the tonnage has been great. With a dependable 9-foot channel these oil companies have now put into operation their own barges and towboats. These large integrated oil companies are not against this proposed regulation because if the small operator who must hire equipment is regulated off the river, they will then control the situation and enjoy a transportation monopoly created by an act of Congress at the public expense.

If Congress wants to defeat the purposes of the Inland Waterways and create a transportation monopoly for large interests who control captive tonnage of coal, oil, etc., they certainly could not find a better method than by passing the Lea-Wheeler bill without the Wadsworth amendment. The record of the Army engineers and War Department from the viewpoint of the relationship of Inland Waterways to national defense is well known and the War Department has maintained its consistency on this matter by attacking this bill. We know you will not be a party to the passage of this bill.

Very truly yours,

MIDLAND COOPERATIVE WHOLESALE,
By EARL PETERSON,
Manager, Coal Department.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include some references from a report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, as one of the conferees may I again call to the attention of the House the problem before the conferees in this matter. We have returned to you this important bill with the exception of one or two items, practically as the House instructed some months ago. I was amused a moment ago when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] was trying to find a reason to oppose this report and talked about the problems of the Great Lakes. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] should have witnessed, as we of the Interstate Committee have, the work of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], and a number of other members of our committee from the Great Lakes section of the country in looking out for the interests of that great section of our country. The representatives from the Great Lakes section, I am sure, are not in sympathy with the criticism of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON], so far as this report is concerned because they have too much confidence in the desire of our committee to be fair to the interests to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. Speaker, this is a lengthy bill. There is a lot to it. I am very happy to note that the only substantial criticism of the work done by the conferees is the elimination of the Wadsworth amendment. I do not believe the Wadsworth amendment means as much as its author contends.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I do not care for additional time. I would like to have those gentlemen who are opposed to the report given time. Maybe they can tell us more substantial reasons why the report should be rejected than we have heard in the last hour, otherwise the report will certainly be adopted.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. I wonder if it would not be worth while for the gentleman to tell us why the conference should be agreed to? Then maybe we can tell him why it should not be.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, this committee bent over backwards almost to accommodate the objection raised by water carriers, but no matter what we do it apparently has no influence whatsoever upon the gentleman from Virginia. Let me prophesy now that after a reasonable period of administering this act he will disagree with his position of today. I have before me a letter from the Merchants & Miners Transportation Co. All recognize this company as fair, reasonable, and representative. It operates along the entire Atlantic coast. That company not only favors the legislation but has advocated it.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The gentleman spoke about those interested in the Great Lakes region. The preceding speaker lives in the Great Lakes area, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] does, and so does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO].

Mr. COLE of Maryland. I have the pleasure of serving with the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] as a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. I doubt if he would support this legislation even with his amendment a part thereof. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO], like some others, looks at legislation of this broad character through cloudy glasses. He is so water-minded.

Mr. Speaker, the House is called upon to pass upon the very perplexing problem whether all forms of transportation shall be regulated by one great agency in this country and regulated fairly as this bill provides. I hope the Members sustain our report asking that this be done. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to insert some letters and telegrams from firms and individuals in Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, it has been said that you can ship freight by water at approximately one-tenth the cost of shipping it by rail. You have also heard it said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that if the Wadsworth amendment is rejected and the Wheeler-Lea bill adopted without that amendment being inserted, it means the end of the waterways. May I say that there is probably one way out with respect to that idea, and that is this: The private carriers will still be able to provide themselves with transportation. I refer to the large concerns such as the Standard Oil Co. and firms of that kind which can afford to purchase tugs and barges in which to ship their own freight. What is the final result of that sort of thing when you carry it into practical operation? It eliminates the small-business man, the little fellow, and it eliminates competition. The net result of it all will be that you will go one step further along the road to the corporative state idea which Mr. Mussolini has perfected so well in Italy. If that is the sort of thing we want in America, then you should vote down the Wadsworth amendment; otherwise, keep it in there. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I insert herewith certain letters and telegrams which I have received expressing opposition to the Transportation Act unless it contains the Wadsworth amendment.

ST. PAUL, MINN., August 8, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We urge your support of the Miller-Wadsworth amendment to the conference report on the Wheeler-Lea bill which gives to our longshoremen in Minnesota the same protection as is accorded railroad employees under the proposed law.

GEO. W. LAWSON,
Secretary, Minnesota Federation of Labor.

ST. PAUL, MINN., August 7, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Understand as result of concerted drive by forces hostile to inland waterways the conferees will report back the Wheeler-Lea transportation bill minus Miller-Wadsworth amendment. The welfare of Minnesota demands your unyielding opposition to any proposal to enact such legislation without this mitigating amendment which the House ordered reinstated.

UPPER MISSISSIPPI AND ST. CROIX RIVER IMPROVEMENT COMMISSION OF MINNESOTA, HERMAN NUELLER, Secretary.

MINNEAPOLIS, August 7, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
United States Congressman,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Just been advised that effort is being made to rush through Wheeler-Lea bill. Bill, we are advised, eliminates Miller-Wadsworth amendment. We all urge you to insist upon retention of Miller-Wadsworth amendment for this is only feature of Wheeler-Lea bill that protects low rates for shipper using Mississippi River to Minneapolis.

TOM VON KUSTER.
HARLAN NYGAARD.

KINGSLEY DAY.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., August 9, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We understand Wheeler-Lea omnibus transportation bill to be presented to Congress twelfth. Strongly urge as a protection to shippers in this territory you insist on retention of Miller-Wadsworth amendment to this bill.

THE CREAM OF WHEAT CORPORATION.

DULUTH, MINN., August 8, 1940.

Hon. J. G. ALEXANDER,
Washington, D. C.:

The International Longshoremen's Unions of Minnesota are opposed to passage of bill S. 2009, known as the Wheeler-Lea Transportation Act, as reported by conference committee. If railroad workers are to be protected under S. 2009, then water-front workers demand also their jobs be protected to same extent. The Miller-Wadsworth amendment will not only protect longshoremen's jobs but will prevent the ruination of a very important arm of our national defense, namely, the carrier by water.

E. L. SLAUGHTER,
Secretary, International Longshoremen's Council of Minnesota and Wisconsin Labor Temple, Duluth, Minn.

CARGILL, INC.,
Minneapolis, Minn, August 9, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As large users of all types of transportation, we ask your support to insist upon the retention of the Miller-Wadsworth amendment in the Wheeler-Lea omnibus transportation bill, which will be submitted to the House for consideration on Monday, August 12, in order to provide full protection to the public at large in the benefits and economy afforded by each type of transportation.

Yours sincerely,

J. H. MACMILLAN.

MINNEAPOLIS JUNIOR ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE,
Minneapolis, Minn, August 9, 1940.

Hon. JOHN ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JOHN: I understand that the conference report on the Wheeler-Lea bill is scheduled for House consideration Monday, August 12.

It is also my understanding that it entirely eliminates the Miller-Wadsworth amendment.

As you know, the Junior Association of Commerce is strongly in favor of the Upper Mississippi Waterway Harbor and has been since 1932. Therefore, if this Miller-Wadsworth bill is eliminated, it would undoubtedly work a hardship on the waterway.

I would like to urge you to insist upon the retention of the Miller-Wadsworth amendment, as it is the only feature of the Wheeler-Lea bill that protects low rates for shippers on the Mississippi River.

Sincerely yours,

GERALD L. MOORE,
President, Junior Association of Commerce.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN].

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the chairman denouncing the Wadsworth amendment, as he did the Jones amendment, the Wadsworth amendment, and the other amendments last July when the bill was considered. I listened to the gentleman from Maryland say that more time should be consumed by those who object to the passage of this bill without the Wadsworth amendment. I simply want to say to the distinguished gentleman and the other members of the conference committee that you were very definitely and positively instructed by a majority vote of this House to put that amendment in this bill. You may have some parliamentary right to bring this bill back into the House without it, but you certainly have no moral right to do it. I hope the House will send the bill back to you and give you another opportunity to carry out the instructions of a majority of this House. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, it has been intimated here that some of us have been misled by being persuaded that we should be for this bill. I have not been overly enthusiastic in my sessions in the Congress about some of the extensions of governmental regulation, but I believe I can say that when it is evident, as it is evident in respect to transportation, that the country is committed to a policy of governmental regulation, then it is only fair to say that competing systems of transportation should also be brought under regulation.

We have seen such regulation extended to the motor carriers. Has the Interstate Commerce Commission destroyed them? Of course not. They are not complaining. We have seen regulation extended to the air carriers. Have they been destroyed?

There is another peculiar thing about this. The original Harrington amendment provided that if any employee on a railroad lost employment by reason of a consolidation the railroad would have to continue to pay him his salary. Right or wrong, in principle that is something of regulation, is it not, regulation applied to the rail carriers? Yet many of those who are opposing this bill because it seeks to bring water carriers under some modest type of regulation joined in voting to recommit the bill to clamp that further regulation on the rail carriers. Is that consistency in respect to regulation?

The conferees have acted in good faith. If it could be said that we could bring nothing back to the House unless we followed to the letter the mandate of the House, we would never have legislation so long as the Senate conferees refused to go along with the instructions we had. I do not care what implications are made; I say to you here and now on this floor that the Senate conferees would not go along with the Wadsworth amendment, so what were we to do except to bring back to the House the best solution we could. The House can now determine for itself whether it wants to insist on the Wadsworth amendment.

We have worked out a compromise of the Jones amendment that seems to suit everybody. If you will recall, it was urged by some that export freight-rate differentials were not given to farm products as they were given to manufactured products shipped for export. I thought upon looking into it that about the same treatment had been given to agricultural exports, and I could not see the need for the Jones amendment. But as it was originally written it went too far. It would have required the application of the same formula used on manufactured products to farm products. Farm products move at much cheaper rates. You cannot apply the same formula to them. So we bring back language which provides that the principles which are designed primarily to equalize port conditions and bring about an increase in foreign trade shall be applied to farm products as well as industrial products.

As to the Harrington amendment, I do not know what the author of that amendment is going to do about this bill, but I do know and understand that the people whose cause he so valiantly championed are not objecting to this provision as it is now written. It follows the principle of the so-called Washington agreement that was a contract entered into by the carriers with their employees to fix the rights of employees whose employment terminated upon consolidation. This language gives to the employees greater protection and more far-reaching protection and recognizes the principle to which we all subscribe, that rights of employees should be protected, and, beyond that, writes it into law.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Does it take care of the employees with respect to abandonments?

Mr. HALLECK. I do not understand that it does, but I may say to the gentleman from Iowa that when he first offered his amendment the amendment did not take care of abandonments.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield briefly to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. What answer does the gentleman believe the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is to make to the Army engineers when they come before us and say that this project will furnish cheap water transportation to the American people?

Mr. HALLECK. I would just like to say about that question that if anyone can find in the hearts or the minds of any of us who have worked on this bill any intent or determination to take from the country the benefits of cheap transportation, I fail to see it. I have said time and again here and to the country that there were proposals coming from different sources that would have done that but we refused to accept them. The very declaration of policy requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to say to the country whatever benefits of cheap transportation we have. I would be the last person to say that after we have spent all of this money to develop water transportation we ought to throw it away. At the same time, however, there is such a thing as fair, unified regulation. There is such a thing, if you please, as well-designed, well-intentioned, and well-administered regulation that will improve the condition of the waterways.

Now, let us consider the Wadsworth amendment. I have never been able to get some folks who are interested in that amendment to say definitely whether it referred to out-of-pocket cost or full allocated cost, although it seems to mean the latter. Some of you may not be altogether familiar with its purpose and I am frank to confess that I do not know as much about it as I might, but I know that with certain movements of freight traffic on the railroads, or anywhere else for that matter, certain traffic will not move unless it has a cheap rate. Much of that includes agricultural products. So they do not fix that rate on the full allocated cost which would include overhead and profit and all the other things, but they figure what the out-of-pocket cost is to move that carload of freight or trainload of freight, add a little to it on the theory that it is better to make something than to not move the freight at all. Now, there are rates like that all over this country. There are rates that are lower than the full allocated cost put into effect simply to equalize the competitive advantages of different communities trying to get into a consumer market.

Now, what does the Wadsworth amendment say? It says that a carrier can reduce rates so long as such rates maintain a compensatory return to the carrier after taking into consideration overhead and all other elements entering into the cost to the carrier for the service rendered.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. HALLECK. Now, what does that mean? That simply means that a rail carrier could not reduce a rate below the full allocated cost in order to move the traffic that would otherwise not be moved; and if anyone can successfully contend to me that it would not have that effect I challenge him to do it. It states that you can reduce the rates only so long as you provide a compensatory return, which, I take it, although the language is garbled and not clear, refers to full-allocated cost, including overhead and profit. I take it that it would mean clearly and simply that these out-of-pocket rates would not be permitted on the railroads.

The effect of that would be to raise rates all over this country. I do not believe any one of you wants to do that.

There are those who have insisted that this amendment should be written into the law because it is necessary to permit water carriers to reduce their rates below what the competing rail rate would be. This is predicated on the false assumption that the Interstate Commerce Commission is going to willfully and wrongfully raise water rates above a fair return just to improve the competitive condition of the railroads. I say we are backed up with experience and history against that argument when we recognize that the Interstate Commerce Commission has had control of the motor carriers and has had the power to do the same thing with them, yet has never seen fit to exercise any such authority or judgment and will never see fit to do so. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I believe about every point in connection with this legislation has been thoroughly covered, but I do want to bring to the attention of the membership of the House this one fact. Originally there were three different interests represented among those in opposition to this legislation as it was brought to the House. It has been found expedient by the managers on the part of the House to grant the wishes of two of those groups. Let those who represent those two groups remember that what they gained was brought about by the assistance of a third group, the group that is still insisting upon consideration of the Miller-Wadsworth amendment. I hope the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] will carry. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from North Carolina 2 minutes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, on the conference report which is now before us there is one main controversy, and that is the so-called Wadsworth amendment. I doubt very much if more than a very few Members of the House have consulted with the Interstate Commerce Commission in regard to the effect on the country of this amendment.

The language of the Wadsworth amendment is not as clear as it might be, but there seems to be little doubt that it not only requires the Commission to permit reduced rates which meet certain cost tests or compensatory standards, but that by implication it also requires the Commission to refuse to permit reduced rates which fail to meet these tests and standards. This was the view repeatedly stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] in his speech on the floor of the House on July 25, 1939—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, permanent bound edition, volume 84, part 9, pages 9962 and 9963.

The cost test or standard for compensatory reduced rates, as prescribed by the amendment, takes into account not only out-of-pocket cost but all elements of cost, including overhead. "It is the general cost," to use the expression of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Thus the amendment would preclude the establishment of a reduced rate by the Commission or by a carrier unless such reduced rate was compensatory and met full cost standards. Although the amendment is directed by its terms only to reduced rates, obviously the same cost standards which apply to reduced rates must logically apply to all rates. The existing passenger fares and great numbers of existing freight rates are lower than would be necessary to meet the full cost standard.

Consider first the passenger fares. The Interstate Commerce Commission has developed and prescribed a formula designed to ascertain the cost of passenger transportation. The use of this formula demonstrates that for every year since 1929 passenger transportation has failed to produce revenues equal to full cost of this service, even without consideration of return on investment. For the 4-year period from 1936 to and including 1939, there has been an annual average deficit as a result of passenger transportation of more than $240,000,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I am sorry, Senator, but I have only 4 minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, this does not apply to passengers.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It does.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; it says material.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It follows that the Wadsworth amendment would, in effect, deprive the Commission of any power to reduce these fares. Also, it would make it impossible for the railroads to make voluntary reductions in passenger fares. The passenger fare reductions accomplished by the Commission in Passenger Fares and Surcharges (214 I. C. C. 174, 227 I. C. C. 17, 227 I. C. C. 685, 237 I. C. C. 271) would have been impossible if the Wadsworth amendment had been in effect. Moreover, if the full cost standard should be applied to passenger fares at this time, it would be necessary to put into effect very large increases in fares. Of course, it would not necessarily follow that these increases in fares would produce corresponding increases in net revenue, because the volume of business affects the unit cost per passenger, and the amount of fare affects the volume of business.

The tremendous extent to which reductions in freight rates would be precluded by the Wadsworth amendment is fairly indicated by the facts to which we shall now call attention. Since 1930 the railroads of the United States, taken as a whole, have never earned a return on investment equal to 3 percent. In fact, during that period they have earned as much as 2½ percent in only 1 year, 1936, when the rate of return was 2.57 percent. For the year 1939, the rate of return was 2.25 percent, and for the year 1938, 1.43 percent. This is a mathematical demonstration that the great bulk of the freight business, as well as the passenger business, on all the railroads together, did not meet a compensatory standard which includes in overhead expenses a fair return on investment. It follows that with respect to the great bulk of freight rates, the Wadsworth amendment would eliminate any possibility of reductions either by action of the Interstate Commerce Commission or by voluntary action of the railroads.

Up to this point our discussion has dealt with the railroads as a whole. It is common knowledge that many individual lines have operating results much more unfavorable than the average results for all railroads. Approximately 30 percent of the total mileage of the country is in the hands of the courts under receivership or trusteeship proceedings. It cannot be questioned that as to a great many individual lines a relatively small part of their freight rates would meet the test of full cost including overhead and a fair return. As a result, reductions of rates by these railroads, either voluntary or by order of the Commission, would appear to be precluded, generally speaking, if the full cost standard of the Wadsworth amendment should be applied.

In the Motor Carrier Act of 1935, part II of the Interstate Commerce Act, at section 213 (a) (1), in speaking of the acquisition of control of one carrier by another, we find the following proviso:

Provided, however, That if a carrier as defined in section 1 (3) of part I, or any person which is controlled by such a carrier or affiliated therewith within the meaning of section 5 (8) of part I, is an applicant, the Commission shall not enter such an order unless it finds that the transaction proposed will promote the public interest by enabling such carrier to use service by motor vehicle to public advantage in its operations and will not unduly restrain competition.

This section of the Motor Carrier Act is specifically repealed by section 21 (e) of the conference report, but section 7 of the conference report amends section 5 (2) (b) of the Interstate Commerce Act by including within that section commensurate language as follows:

Provided, That if a carrier by railroad subject to this part, or any person which is controlled by such a carrier, or affiliated therewith within the meaning of paragraph (6), is an applicant in the case of any such proposed transaction involving a motor carrier, the Commission shall not enter such an order unless it finds that the transaction proposed will be consistent with the public interest and will enable such carrier to use service by motor vehicle to public advantage in its operations and will not unduly restrain competition.

The conferees wish to make it plain that it is not their intention, by changing the language of section 213, hereinbefore quoted, to change the legislative intent of the Congress one iota with respect to the acquisition of a carrier by motor vehicle by a carrier by railroad, and that it is the intention of the conferees that section 5 (2) (b), as amended by section 7 of the conference report, shall have the same practical application and legal effect as section 213 (a) (1) as it is now shown in part II of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOLMES].

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, I believe we are wasting our time in discussing but one phase of this whole transportation legislation. If you will take your bill, and read the policy of this Congress, I think you will see that the Congress is trying to lay out for the benefit of all forms of transportation the best rule possible for all involved, and you will find that we have clearly stated the reasons why this legislation is necessary at this time. We began the hearings on the transportation legislation 1 year ago last January. At that time, and for nearly 3 solid months, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce invited every Member of this House to appear and give their views on this legislation. We had the interest of the railroads, the motor carriers, the water carriers all present, when we considered the various phases of this legislation. When we found that we were going to do an injustice in any form, you will find that we modified the legislation to eliminate any such injustice, and indeed, and what we are hearing today and what we have heard in opposition to this bill, is the same cry out of the wilderness that came into the well of this House when we brought the Motor Carrier Act into the House and passed that legislation. And can you find any industry that has made such progress, such strides in bringing back its business as the motor carriers' modern trucks makes? It is safer today to travel by motor over the highways than ever, because that legislation made it possible to get rid of delapidated trucks on the highways and have safe equipment substituted in its place.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as remains to this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for 9 minutes.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the conference report now before the House is the result of an earnest and sincere effort upon the part of your conferees to arrive at a fair and just settlement of the differences existing between the House and Senate with respect to the provisions of the transportation bill passed by both Houses of Congress more than a year ago.

Your conferees from the House have not overlooked or failed to appreciate the obligation placed upon them by the action of the House in directing the inclusion in the bill of the Jones, Harrington, and Wadsworth amendments written into the bill upon the floor of the House.

We have been able to obtain from the Senate conferees an agreement that sustains the principle, if not the exact language of the House, of the Jones and the Harrington amendments. This agreement, as presented in our report, does not destroy the purpose or intent of either amendment. And it is our understanding that the language agreed upon, which in no way materially changes the Jones amendment and only slightly modifies the Harrington amendment, is not opposed by those who were interested in having these amendments written into the bill.

The Jones amendment was adopted by the House to place farm commodities upon the same basis as industrial commodities with respect to export rates. This amendment was opposed in the House by some, not because of opposition to the principle involved, but because in the opinion of those members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce who had given the matter careful study it seemed that the principle involved was already adequately set forth in the bill and already recognized by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the exercise of its rate-making powers, and for the further reason that the amendment, as drawn, was uncertain and seemed to create conditions not contemplated or intended by the sponsors of the amendment. In other words, in an effort to fix the principle above mentioned the language used created doubt and uncertainty as to its effect. The language adopted by the conferees, which we understand meets with the approval of the sponsor, leaves no doubt as to the intent and scope of the amendment. While I am still of the opinion that the Jones amendment is unnecessary, yet I favor its adoption as written into the report because I believe in the principle it seeks to establish, and I am willing to put it in the language as agreed upon that it may be satisfactory to those less certain than myself as to the effectiveness of the provisions of the bill as originally reported by the committee, supplemented by the practice of the Commission.

Now, as to the Harrington amendment, the conferees have adopted practically the same language as originally adopted by the House, but with a modification as to the length of time the provisions are to be effective. This amendment, as you are all possibly aware, was not in the Senate bill in any form whatsoever. Objection was made that the amendment, in the language adopted by the House, would guarantee for life the employment of any and all employees of railroads participating in a consolidation or merger of their lines even though the employee's service may have been as little as a month, or even less; and, furthermore, if there was no work for them as a result of the consolidation or merger, yet their compensation would continue upon the same basis as at the time of consolidation and until death or their voluntary separation from the service of the company.

In fact there were some who were of the opinion that it froze every job for the employee in service at the time of consolidation but also froze perpetually every job which existed at the time of the consolidation or merger. So, even death or resignation of the employee did not end the job. It would descend to someone else even though not in the employ of the railroad at the time of the consolidation or merger. And, then there was also further uncertainty in the opinion of some representatives of railroad labor as to whether the language of the amendment might not preclude voluntary agreements, between management and men by collective bargaining, from being entered into.

I want, however, to make it clear that no one who expressed the opinions I have mentioned thought for a moment that any of these possibilities were ever intended by the sponsors of the amendment. It was recognized that the real intent of the sponsors was to save railroad employees from being suddenly thrust out of employment as the result of any consolidation or merger entered into. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of this House in presenting its original bill used language which it thought accomplished that purpose. We thought we were giving legislative assurance of at least a continuance of the Washington agreement which had been previously entered into by the railroads and the 21 railroad brotherhoods. This agreement had furthermore been recognized and accepted by the Interstate Commerce Commission as a condition precedent for its approval in the Rock Island case, United States v. Lowden (308 U. S. 225), and this action of the Commission has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in a suit attacking its validity. We thought that the language we had used not only established this agreement for all succeeding cases of consolidation or merger but that the language used would not preclude the Commission from improving upon the terms of that agreement if necessary to provide equitable and fair treatment of employees affected by any consolidation or merger in the future. Thus, it will be seen that there has been no difference in thought and desire between the committee and the sponsors of the Harrington amendment. In fact the provision contained in the original bill had the approval of 20 out of the 21 railroad brotherhoods. And, it is significant in this connection that the one brotherhood which did not agree to our language had never asked for anything other than that the entire consolidation provision be left out of the bill and the matter be left at this time as a matter for collective bargaining.

The conferees have struggled long and hard to agree upon language that would be mutually satisfactory to all the Senate conferees, the brotherhoods, and the railroads. We believe the language now proposed as a compromise is a fair and just solution. We also understand that it is acceptable to all who are to be affected by the provision. I sincerely hope that it will have the approval of the House as I do not believe anything further can be done if this fails to be acceptable. If this should fail then I am fearful that it would not be possible to obtain any legislation on the subject. I do not believe that any one who is truly interested in the welfare of the employees, or in helping the plight of the distressed railroad industry would want such a result. Nor should anyone overlook the fact that the adoption of this amendment as agreed to by the conferees gives railroad workers protection against sudden dismissal and financial assistance that is not enjoyed by workers in any other industry. And, this is true without any exception or qualification whatsoever.

I now wish to discuss the Wadsworth amendment. In order that we might all understand the full import of this amendment I wish to read it at this point:

In order that the public at large may enjoy the benefit and economy afforded by each type of transportation, the Commission shall permit each type of carrier or carriers to reduce rates so long as such rates maintain a compensatory return to the carrier or carriers after taking into consideration overhead and all other elements entering into the cost to the carrier or carriers for the service rendered: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall be construed so as to affect the long-and-short-haul provision of section 4.

While there is a similarity between this amendment and the Miller amendment adopted by the Senate, yet there is a great difference between them. The Miller amendment did not contain the proviso which is part of the Wadsworth amendment, namely:

Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall be construed so as to affect the long-and-short-haul provision of section 4.

The addition of this provision to the Wadsworth amendment was made after the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] had offered his amendment. It was made at the insistent demand of some Members from the West who were fearful that the language of the Wadsworth amendment would repeal or adversely affect the long-and-short-haul provision of section 4. Without it, many would not have voted for the Wadsworth amendment as offered. The adoption of this addition to the Wadsworth amendment changed that amendment.

This amendment to the Wadsworth amendment not only illustrates the uncertainty and ambiguity arising from the language of the Wadsworth amendment, and to which I intend to speak more at length in a minute or two, but it also brought a new element into the rate-making policy attempted to be set up by the Wadsworth amendment. And in this connection we must continue to bear in mind that the addition of this amendment created a different policy than that contained in the Miller amendment adopted by the Senate.

I now wish to discuss the Wadsworth amendment from the standpoint of the harm it would do if adopted, even without the proviso.

To fully appreciate what the Wadsworth amendment proposed to do and the far-reaching effects that would result, it is necessary to have a clear understanding of it. But, unfortunately, this cannot be obtained simply by reading the amendment, because its ambiguous language fails to reveal the true purport of the amendment and leaves an inaccurate impression.

The Wadsworth amendment, according to the way it is expressed, provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission should permit each mode of transportation to reduce rates "so long as such rates maintain a compensatory return to the carrier or carriers after taking into consideration overhead and all other elements entering into the cost to the carrier or carriers for the service rendered." Inferentially, it means there can be no reduction at any time unless it meets that standard. We all know that many rates now in existence could not have been obtained if such a rate-making standard as the Wadsworth amendment set-up had been in effect. I know of no standard that could be set-up that would work more havoc and hardship to the farmers of this country. It would seem that the primary effect of the amendment is to promote and facilitate the reduction of rates. Actually, the very opposite would be true. The important effect of the amendment would be to prohibit the Commission from allowing a reduction that would result in a rate which would not be high enough to pay a proportionate share of all costs and profits. I shall have more to say on this point a little later.

I wish to call your attention to the manner in which this amendment would operate. Although the amendment does not expressly so provide, the fact remains that before the Commission would permit a lower rate, the carrier seeking the reduction would have to prove to the complete satisfaction of the Commission that the rate would be compensatory. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] himself said on this floor, in discussing his amendment, that "the carrier must demonstrate that his rate is compensatory, including overhead."

I wonder if the House knows what this would mean. In fact, I wonder if the proponents of the amendment fully realize what it would mean. If they had understood its true significance, I feel certain they would never have advocated its inclusion in the bill.

The proponents of the amendment have argued that its operation would result in giving the public lower rates by promoting and facilitating rate reductions. They have held it out as an effective way of taking care of so-called territorial discriminations in rates and said that it would assure each type of carrier of the benefit of its inherent advantages. They have said also that the amendment would protect one mode of transportation from unfair rate-cutting competition by another type with higher costs.

Actually, the amendment would not accomplish any of these things. Instead, it would operate to produce results directly contrary to what its supporters allege they desire.

As I mentioned before, the amendment is so worded that it would appear that its chief purpose is to require the Interstate Commerce Commission to permit carriers to reduce their rates under stated conditions. This, however, would not be the effect of the amendment. The amendment would not only slow up and seriously hamper all reductions but would absolutely prevent a great many desirable reductions from being made.

There are several reasons why this would be true. In the first place, there is no sound economic reason why it should be necessary for each rate to pay its full share of all costs and at the same time contribute something to profit. If rates were made on this theory, classification of goods and commodities for rate-making purposes would be next to impossible and, as a consequence, the rates on a large number of commodities, particularly farm products, would be prohibitive. What this would do to industry and agriculture can easily be seen.

Do not misunderstand me. I am not contending that the freight-rate structure should not be set up so as to produce revenues which, in the aggregate, will pay all costs and net a fair profit. I do not believe anyone would argue against that point. But it is unnecessary that each individual rate, in order to be profitable, must bear its full share of all costs, including overhead, and produce a reasonable profit above such costs. If a rate is high enough to pay more than out-of-pocket operating expenses, it helps meet some of the constant overhead.

There are many rates and fares in force at the present time that do not and should not be compelled to measure up to the full-cost standard. The amendment would prevent rates from being lowered, irrespective of the reason for the reduction. Under such circumstances, in a good many instances, traffic due to the rates in force could not possibly afford to move in volume.

Almost as serious is the effect that the operation of the amendment would have on proposed reductions. A carrier or shipper proposing a reduction would have to prove to the satisfaction of the Commission that the lesser rate would be compensatory. In an effort to accomplish this the carrier or shipper would have to make a cost study. This would take time and money. Moreover, it is difficult to determine the true cost of transporting a commodity from one point to another for the simple reason that a carrier performs almost innumerable different services, the operating costs of many of which are joint expenses. For instance, how should a railroad charge up the cost of maintaining its track? The track is used by both passenger and freight trains, and in the case of freight, all kinds of goods and commodities are transported. What should be the relation that varied commodities should bear to each other in fixing a cost estimate for rate purposes? This is but one of many questions that would arise.

It is obvious that this complicated procedure would place an undue burden on both the shipper or the carrier—an unnecessary and onerous expense which, in the final analysis, must be assumed by the shipping public. Furthermore, it would consume a great deal of the Commission's time at the expense of the taxpayers.

Bear in mind, also, that the Nation's transportation needs are changing constantly. Long delays in adjusting rates to meet these needs may stop the movement of traffic.

The amendment, therefore, would not promote and facilitate rate reductions. Indeed, it would strongly operate in the other direction, and no one, in the long run, would stand to benefit.

Furthermore, the Wadsworth amendment is totally unnecessary as a means of dealing with any so-called territorial rate discriminations. This matter is adequately covered in another section of the bill. And even without S. 2009, the Interstate Commerce Commission possesses the authority to deal with this subject comprehensively either upon its own motion or upon complaint. The amendment would not be helpful in this respect, and, indeed, would make it more difficult to adjust rates between territories.

The bill before us provides for fair and impartial regulation of all modes of transportation so that the inherent advantages of each will be recognized and preserved. There is no need for any amendment to give each form of transportation assurance on this point.

The bill, as it stands, also fully protects one type of common carrier from unfair rate-cutting competition by another having higher costs. In the light of its provisions, the Interstate Commerce Commission could not permit such unfair or destructive competitive practices. Consequently, the Wadsworth amendment would contribute nothing in the way of safeguarding a carrier from unfair rate-cutting but would create an unbearable and unjust burden upon shippers.

The Wadsworth amendment would not accomplish the things which its proponents say they would like to bring about. It would not benefit the carriers, the shippers, or the general public.

If this were the only reason for not incorporating the Wadsworth amendment in S. 2009, it would be sufficient. But there are other reasons. The Wadsworth amendment, were it to be written into law, would bring about a revolution in the economics of the country. It would go far beyond what its proponents intended, or even thought of, and would be decidedly injurious to the public welfare.

Lack of time will not permit me to discuss all of the far-reaching and disastrous effects that would result from the proposed amendment, but I should like to touch briefly upon several of the most serious.

Under the amendment Congress would prescribe a rigid rule to control the Interstate Commerce Commission's judgment concerning minimum rates. It has long been recognized that making freight rates by statute cannot be successful. Neither can regulation by arbitrary and inflexible rate-making rules be successful. Flexibility and elasticity are as important to transportation price making as they are to price making in other industries, and rates cannot be made by formula, but must be regulated by the sound judgment of an administrative body.

We should not forget that Government has had little experience in the regulation of minimum rates. Consequently, there is no practical basis upon which Congress could successfully—if, indeed, it should—fix an arbitrary standard for such rates. It is far better that the principles controlling minimum rates be developed from decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission under general statutory guides rather than under a specific arbitrary rule.

I rather suspect that the proponents of the Wadsworth amendment gave little thought to the effect that the full-cost standard would have not only on those rates being considered for reduction but also on other rates, passenger and freight alike.

If we were to operate on the theory that each individual rate must be high enough to meet all costs and contribute to profit, then it would be necessary to raise a great many rates now in force. This would be particularly true of passenger fares, and many farm products now transported in bulk, which, as we all know, do not produce sufficient revenues to pay all the costs of passenger transportation as determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission in computing the costs of this service. If these rates were to be increased to reduce the theoretical $100,000,000-a-year loss, we have no assurance that this action would stimulate passenger revenues. Indeed, there are those, including the Interstate Commerce Commission, who believe that higher rates would reduce traffic, and the railroads would suffer an even greater loss. Who, then, will argue that either the railroads or the public would benefit were the full-cost standard to be applied to passenger fares?

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] stated during his discussion today that his amendment did not include passenger rates, but only rates relating to materials. In this he was mistaken. It includes both, and he has so discovered in discussing the matter with me a few minutes ago. As an honorable Member of this House, he does not wish the membership to be misled, and hence I have his authority to make this explanation.

It is true, to a great extent, of the freight business. There are countless freight rates which are not on the full-cost basis—rates that were made so that traffic which could not move on the higher rate levels could move at the prevailing rates. On such a basis, America has developed industrially and agriculturally, and also on this basis business is now established and adjusted.

Imagine, if you can, what would happen were this rate structure to be destroyed. Much of the traffic now moving could move no longer. Many industrial centers and agricultural regions which depend on low-cost transportation to get their products to market would suffer immeasurably. Rates on other commodities would necessarily increase, thereby placing an added burden on the shippers of these commodities and the eventual consumers.

But that is not all. The full-cost standard would serve to strengthen private carriers at the expense of common carriers; it would encourage traffic to go by an uneconomical form of transportation; it would place American carriers at a disadvantage with foreign carriers. Surely these are not the intent of the amendment's advocates.

Although the sole purpose of the Wadsworth amendment was apparently to control competition between rival carriers, it will be seen that its inescapable effects would extend far beyond this. No good could possibly come from it, but the damage it would do to the economic structure of our Nation is incalculable. There is no valid reason why the amendment should be included in S. 2009, and there are many reasons why it should not be a part of the bill. We should do nothing that will unnecessarily prevent or delay rate reductions; strike a blow at the fundamental principle of rate making upon which this country was developed, and obstruct or hinder the free flow of commerce which is so essential to our economic welfare.

In closing, I wish to call particular attention to the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission, after deliberate consideration, has reached the conclusion that a restriction such as that which would be imposed by the Wadsworth amendment is both unnecessary and undesirable. I quote from a report accompanying the letter of January 29, 1940, submitted by Joseph B. Eastman, chairman of the legislative committee of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

> In our judgment, the provision in question is not necessary in order that the public at large may enjoy the benefit and economy afforded by each type of transportation. The requirement in the rate-making rule that the Commission give due consideration to the effect of rates on the movement of traffic by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed and also to the need in the public interest of adequate and efficient transportation by such carrier or carriers at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service, coupled with the admonition in the declaration of policy in section 1 that the provisions of the act be so administered as to recognize and preserve the inherent advantages of each mode of transportation, will afford adequate protection in this respect. If experience should show that further protection is needed, contrary to our expectation, Congress can amend the act, but such a restriction as is now proposed is, we believe, both unnecessary and undesirable.

The conference report should be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, the pending transportation bill involves many highly technical provisions. It is, however, of great importance to the shippers of the country and to the transportation agencies as well. The greater part of the discussion in opposition to the bill now before the House is based on an incorrect assumption. There is nothing whatever in the pending measure which could by any fair interpretation be regarded as unjust to water transportation or to any other kind of transportation. Let me read from the bill. In section 1 appears the following language:

> It is hereby declared to be the national transportation policy of Congress to provide for fair and impartial regulation of all modes of transportation, subject to the provisions of this act, so administered as to recognize and preserve the inherent advantages of each.

How much plainer could language be than that is? It is crystal clear that there is no basis in the bill for the apprehension expressed by those opposed to the measure.

Now, let us examine the proposal of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to require that rates shall maintain a compensatory return to the carrier. In answer to a question, when the bill was before the House previously, Mr. WADSWORTH made the following statement: "May I say in reply to the gentleman from Indiana that under this amendment the compensatory return is estimated from taking into consideration overhead and all other elements. The carrier must demonstrate that his rate is compensatory, including overhead."

Now, if such a rule were enforced a great deal of the grain that the farmers now ship would be required to pay an increased freight rate. Of course, nobody desires that to happen. A rigid legal requirement that rates must be fully compensatory would necessitate a great increase in passenger rates and that would simply drive passenger traffic off the roads altogether and therefore necessitate an increase in the rates that shippers of freight would be forced to pay in order to make up the revenue lost to the carriers as a result of losing the passenger business.

Now let me say a word in regard to the so-called Harrington amendment. I think it was the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HARRINGTON] himself who expressed great concern because of the alleged failure to protect against loss of position because of abandonments of railroad service. Let me read you the language that Mr. HARRINGTON offered originally when the bill was before the House and which was adopted. It reads as follows:

> Provided, however, That no such transaction shall be approved by the Commission if such transaction will result in unemployment or displacement of the employees of the carriers or in the impairment of existing employment rights of said employees.

That is the exact language of his amendment and all of his amendments. There is not a single word in his amendment about abandonments.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I am sorry, I do not have time.

I believe the Members of the House know that I have sponsored many measures which are beneficial to the railroad workers of the United States. I believe I know how railroad men feel. I do not hesitate a moment in saying that the revised provision contained in the present conference report is more advantageous to railroad workers than was the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HARRINGTON], offered when the bill was before the House. Now, my friends, let me urge again the importance of not being misled by any fictitious issue. Let us meet this problem squarely. If we really believe in regulation, we must have scientific regulation applied to all forms of transportation. You cannot make fish of one and fowl of the other and have any logical regulation. None of those supporting this measure desires any advantage for one type of transportation over any other kind of transportation. If I thought that there is any deliberate plan to do an injustice to one kind of transportation in order to give an advantage to some other kind of transportation, whether it be highway, rail, or water, I would protest in every way possible against the passage of the measure.

Let me tell you that the conferees have labored long and earnestly to do what they thought was wise and equitable considering every interest involved and constantly keeping in mind the public who use transportation service and pay the price that makes it possible for the transportation agencies to operate.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Just briefly.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Will you tell the House the attitude of organized railroad labor?

Mr. CROSSER. I do not have any hesitation in saying that the overwhelming majority of the railroad workers of the United States are looking hopefully for the enactment of this measure because they feel that it would aid in promoting justice. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on agreeing to the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

MOTION TO RECOMMIT

Mr. WADSWORTH moves that the bill (S. 2009) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes, together with the House amendment thereto, and the conference report thereon, be recommittted to the committee of conference with the following instructions to the managers on the part of the House:

That the managers on the part of the House insist on the inclusion in the report of the committee of conference the provision adopted by the House known as the Wadsworth amendment, which reads as follows:

"In order that the public at large may enjoy the benefit and economy afforded by each type of transportation, the Commission shall permit each type of carrier or carriers to reduce rates so long as such rates maintain a compensatory return to the carrier or carriers after taking into consideration overhead and all other elements entering into the cost to the carrier or carriers for the service rendered."

That the managers on the part of the House insist on the exclusion from the report of the committee of conference the provision for new legislation found in section 7 of the proposed bill, amending section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act by inserting a new paragraph, 16, reading as follows:

"(16) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (14), the Commission shall have authority, upon application of any carrier, as defined in section 1 (3), and after hearing, by order to authorize such carrier to own or acquire ownership of, to lease or operate, to have or acquire control of, or to have or acquire an interest in, a common carrier by water or vessel, not operated through the Panama Canal, with which the applicant does or may compete for traffic, if the Commission shall find that the continuance or acquisition of such ownership, lease, operation, control, or interest will not prevent such common carrier by water or vessel from being operated in the interest of the public and with advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people, and that it will not exclude, prevent, or reduce competition on the route by water under consideration: Provided, That if the transaction or interest sought to be entered into, continued, or acquired is within the scope of paragraph (2) (a), the provisions of paragraph (2) shall be applicable thereto in addition to the provisions of this paragraph: And provided further, That no such authorization shall be necessary if the carrier having the ownership, lease, operation, control, or interest has, prior to the date of this section as amended becomes effective, obtained an order of extension under the provisions of paragraph (21) of this section, as in effect prior to such date, and such order is still in effect."

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 212, not voting 106, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be allowed 5 days in which to extend their own remarks on the conference report just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. BLOOM]. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order I ask for recognition for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. There are several special orders which have heretofore been made, and this is District day. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri later.

Mr. SCHULTE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE] rise?

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak relative to a bill that has been agreed to by the District of Columbia Committee.

The SPEAKER. This is District day. Does the District of Columbia Committee desire to call up any bill?

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, as the ranking member of that committee, may I inform the Chair that the District of Columbia Committee has no bills to call up today.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes on District business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE]?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there will be no bills called up today?

Mr. SCHULTE. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE]?

There was no objection.

THE MILK SITUATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, for quite some time a great many of us, who are very much interested in the milk situation here, have been fighting to get an adequate supply of milk and at a decent price for people in the District of Columbia. We are all agreed, I believe, that there has been a vicious monopoly here in the District of Columbia for some time and that the monopoly still exists. In order to pacify a great many Members of Congress this monopoly, aided and abetted by the Maryland-Virginia Producers' Association and the Chestnut Farms Dairy of Chevy Chase, are heralding the fact to the world today that "District of Columbia 5-cent milk goes on sale today."

What a monstrosity and what a joke to wish on people who are oppressed, and what a shameful effort to try to pacify some Members of Congress. Let us see what this does. It says here that the milk stations are open from 1 o'clock to 5 every day except Sundays and holidays. In other words, the people are given 4 hours a day to purchase this milk.

Let us see who may get this milk and how generous this monopoly is. A nursing mother may have 1 pint of milk a day. Children under 17 years of age may have 1 pint a day, irrespective of how sick they may be, irrespective of how broken in health, yet they dare not violate this law because they will be criminals—so all they get is the 1 pint a day. All adults over that age may have only a half-pint of milk a day, again irrespective of how badly their health may be affected, irrespective of what the doctor says, or how much milk they care to drink to build up their bodies, yet according to the monopoly one-half pint is all they get; and if they violate this law they will be branded worse than criminals, and again the Corporation Council's office will be watching them.

Mr. Speaker, I have gone around to several members of the Maryland-Virginia Producers' Association and asked why they were trying to foster this law, and if they did not have an adequate supply of this surplus milk as it was going to waste anyway.

Here is what a member of the organization told me. He says:

I will tell you, Mr. Congressman, we have been feeding this milk to our pigs, and it is necessary that we have some to feed our hogs.

In other words, ladies and gentlemen of this Congress, the pigs on the farms in Maryland and Virginia come ahead of the nursing mothers and children, the invalids, the crippled, the sick, and the downtrodden of Washington.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. This Chestnut Farms Dairy, which has the milk monopoly in the District of Columbia and is part of the $90,000,000 National Dairy Trust, is not furnishing the milk to these poor people at 5 cents per quart. If the gentleman will read the entire announcement, he will find that Uncle Sam's Treasury is paying this milk monopoly an additional 2.7 cents a quart for the milk which is sold to a few people for 5 cents a quart.

Mr. SCHULTE. Yes. It says here, "The cheap milk is made possible through cooperation of the Maryland-Virginia Producers' Association, Surplus Market Corporation," and so forth.

There is only one organization that can sell this milk in the District of Columbia. That is the Chestnut Farms Dairy. Now why is it that only one organization can sell this milk—why can't it be made possible that all be given an opportunity?

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HULL. May I call the gentleman's attention to the further fact that the Surplus Market Corporation pays the Chestnut Farms Dairy 2.7 cents per quart as a subsidy on this same milk.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, they have been yelling about the purity of their milk, about how superior their milk is over any other milk, and today my good friend from Pennsylvania, who was very much in sympathy with us, will tell you they are buying milk in Pennsylvania which does not come under the District of Columbia inspection, and I am under the impression that that milk is just as good and just as pure as any milk that is produced in Maryland or Virginia, or any other State, as certainly the gentleman from Pennsylvania looks healthy to me.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman has challenged the milk of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCHULTE. No; I do not yield. Probably the gentleman is a member of this Virginia organization. I do not know. If so, he ought to hang his head in shame to think that he is denying the mothers and children in the District of Columbia, the invalids and cripples, and everyone else in the District of Columbia who is compelled to pay that exorbitant price.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? He has made reference to me.

Mr. SCHULTE. I refuse to yield, Mr. Speaker. No; I have not made reference to the gentleman from Pennsylvania—certainly he does not represent the entire State of Pennsylvania.

Those who are associated and affiliated with this organization ought to be ashamed of themselves—picking on the innocent mothers and children who cannot afford to protect themselves. There is only one place the people of the District of Columbia can look for help, and that is the Congress. They have no government here, which we all know. They have no one here to whom they can bring their troubles except the Members of this Congress, and I know the Members of this Congress are very sympathetic toward their cause, and especially so in this milk fight, because of the many Members who have personally told me that they want to help.

I say to you that if Congress stays in session long enough I want to bring back and revive the so-called Schulte bill to force the issue here in the Nation's Capital and to see whether a monopoly as huge and vicious as this is in the District of Columbia can continue to exist and deny the people in the District of Columbia adequate milk at a decent price. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER. Under a previous special order, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATRICK] is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, the issue that is perhaps most in the mind of every Member of this body right now is this draft measure. One trouble with Congress is that we have in this body so many sincere and faithful Members that work up fine plans for yesterday. The folks in this country are depending upon those who can recognize a today and can imagine a tomorrow. Sometimes we think of tomorrow but do not fully comprehend it.

Let us see whether or not a draft is needed. Also we hear a great cry of a draft's being of an un-American nature.

I got in touch with the military authorities of this Nation and tried to determine, before I reached a conclusion of my own on this issue, what we should do. This is one thing in which there is no politics. It has been so pronounced, and it seems pretty nearly the fact. There may be a few who have opposed the administration on this or that measure who find it easier if they think the administration is for it to go in that direction, but I think those are few indeed; but there are persons in this country who have held hands with the past so long that they are unable to get the appalling significance of the fact that only Great Britain and America today stand between grim totalitarianism and liberty and freedom as we understand and feel it. Holland, Belgium, France, and Scandinavia did not become quite hysterical enough, if you choose to call this alarm hysteria. They heard the sword rattling over on the Rhine; they heard a strange rustling of the leaves of the linden trees, but they did not feel that they should be disturbed about it, until the light of their freedom was dimmed, yet we have those in our own midst today who ask the foolish question, "Where is the enemy and who is the enemy?" By this time every school child should know that a revolution is shaking the earth, and war has been declared against freedom, freedom for the individual; a war has been declared against competitive commerce in the world, and it is coming nearer to us every day.

Thomas Jefferson saw a time when this might come. Monroe foresaw that a foreign foot set upon the Western Hemisphere would imperil our security and was able to get his doctrine established as a safeguard—and in his day there had never been an army tank, a Stuka dive bomber, or a flame thrower, or an Adolf Hitler loose in the world.

We have listened to the wishful thinker until we have come to the threshold of our greatest danger in a state of positive unpreparedness. The few things we are doing today should have been done months and even years ago. The cry of the isolationists is the cry of a baby. We must build our defenses so no nation will dare strike us. We must do this with all speed or we shall certainly perish as a free people. I do not think there is any question on earth about that. Where would we be today if it were not for Great Britain? Our beloved, solemn, and sacred Monroe Doctrine is sitting behind the safety and security, the benign protection of the English Navy, and has been for these many years.

I do not call Col. Charles Lindbergh a "fifth columnist." I do not know what he is. In his better days he was a cracking good mechanic; I know that. This is the country of Eli Whitney, and Thomas A. Edison, and Luther Burbank, Orville Wright, and of Morse, Bell, and Fulton; and none of them felt called upon to become a Moses or to come forward as a great seer and thinker to lead a blind and dumb nation into light and hearing. I wish Colonel Lindbergh would take time out from his broad instructions to his country in economic philosophy to read a story by Aesop—a simple story of a frog that tried to become a bull. Everyone should see by now that dictators barge right in and take what they want. Hitler, as well as Mussolini, has announced to the world what he thinks of the Monroe Doctrine. Why did he feel called upon to make this pronouncement? Does any reasoning American need more to make him realize our position on this earth?

Then we have those who stand up with head uncovered and say, "Conscription means war. It gives a war psychology to the Nation." Such quibbling remarks have no place in the discussion of what is going on today. Of course, instead of meaning war it may mean, or it has a chance of meaning, quite the reverse. But this Nation is the world's richest prize, with its coal and iron ore and oil and broad, rich acres; rivers and harbors; roads; and industrial, alert people. It is the earth's strongest temptation to the dictator.

In preparing to spend $10,000,000,000 for airplanes, tanks, guns, and additional Navy, we must have men who have a working education and men who are prepared to do business with this armament. Today the Army calls for needed men, and a call for 50,000 nets only 23,000. A drive was made for 2 weeks for recruits in Grand Rapids, Mich., the home of Senator VANDENBERG. This is reported to me by the military enlisting office which was in charge of the drive. Billboards and announcements were used, and how many were signed up in 2 weeks? One man. We are right now short over 100,000 men on our congressional authorization with respect to the Army. We are not short on our Navy enlistments and we are not short on marines, but we are short on our Army authorization.

Then there is the mama who says that she did not raise her boy to be a soldier. The boy may be a very good boy. You remember Sergeant York, who was one of the ace soldiers of the war. He was not a volunteer, yet he made a very good soldier. It is just like the mountain girl who said of her mountain mate, that Bolivar is a wonderful husband, but that she had an awful time making him pop the question. We must have our ramparts defended. We must wake up America and put her to work. It is not a little job to recruit men for the Army. Even with regularity, only 32 percent that present themselves pass muster into the Army, the physical requirements must be standard, and then besides there is the definite need of discipline among our young men today. There is no way of knowing the percentage, but a great percentage of these would get discipline that today they are not getting on the streets, and many a man owes the fact that he is made respectable and an honorable fine citizen to the fact that at some time in his life he has been submitted to a discipline that taught him to serve and obey rules and regulations. Of the young men who volunteer, only 32 out of each 100 pass, and the Adjutant General's Office informs me that so far as the Navy and Marine Corps are concerned, there is no present personnel problem. But here is one thing. Their enlistments come from the States as do the Army enlistments. Oklahoma, Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia—those are the places in which you find names like Mitchell and Johnson and Brown and Smith and Jones, and they are the ones inspired by the power of patriotism to maintain a preparedness army. I think some of the boys in some other States never go into the Army until they rush in to get rid of some girl they ought to marry, and as soon as she marries some other fellow, if she does, then they go to their Congressman to get them out again. We want some folks to join the Army for patriotic reasons. If you are talking of democracy, what is the finer brand of democracy than that which would properly distribute those equally in preparing a defense army? I am interested in the patriots from New York. I am greatly attracted by the spirit of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], the co-author of the Wadsworth-Burke bill. The gentleman from New York is one of the real statesmen in this lawmaking body. I think the population of New York amounts to 12,588,000. In the first 6 months of this year 7,013 volunteered in the State of New York. Now let us drop down to Texas. Texas has a population of only a little over 5,000,000, and yet 6,648 men volunteered there in these first 6 months.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman has mentioned people with names like Brown, Smith, Jones, Mitchell, and Johnson as enlisting from Tennessee, Texas, Kentucky, Oklahoma, and other Southern States. Does the gentleman's statistics show that there are many Peppers from Florida or Ochs Adlers from New York enlisting at this time?

Mr. PATRICK. From New York and Florida? Why, I am not taking up individuals. There are 130,000,000 people in the United States and we have not time to take them all up individually.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. But the gentleman mentioned the Mitchells, the Browns, the Joneses, the Johnsons, and the Smiths as recently enlisting from Oklahoma, Texas, Kentucky, and Tennessee. He mentioned those as recently enlisting, and I ask him whether there are any Peppers from Florida or Adlers from New York among those who have recently enlisted for active military service.

Mr. PATRICK. We have some Schafers down in Alabama but of course they are Democrats. We have Democratic Schafers in Alabama.

Mr. McDOWELL. Is the gentleman trying to make the point that the volunteers from the South number up more than the volunteers from the North?

Mr. PATRICK. Kentucky leads.

Mr. McDOWELL. Does it occur to the gentleman that perhaps the amazing difference in wage scales between what they pay in, say, Mississippi and what they pay in Pennsylvania, might account for much of that? Down there $21 a month in the Army might appeal to them, while up in Pennsylvania they get that much a week.

Mr. PATRICK. It may be. I do not know. Something accounts for it, and the fact remains that we are faced with the need, and that the Army right now under the authorization ought to be 375,000, and there is a hole there now of 105,000 that we must fill, and yet you say give the volunteer enlistments a chance. Throw the Nation into a sea of danger to give a system a chance when that system has already been weighed and found wanting.

By the first of the year the program is—and I do not hear anybody demur to it—that we should have in the Army 400,000 more men. How are you going to get 400,000 more men when you are already 105,000 shy under the congressional authorization now open?

Mr. McDOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield.

Mr. McDOWELL. Last week in the city of Philadelphia 650 men tried to enlist and less than 300 were accepted. The others were declined for various physical reasons. Do you not think the United States, under the present emergency, should reduce the physical qualifications—such a thing as all of a man's teeth needed, flat feet, and so forth? I am 37 years old and the Army refused me under any circumstances and yet, according to the doctors, my health is perfect. Do you not think that we could get thousands more soldiers in our Army if they would reduce these peacetime regulations for the soldiers? We do not need perfect men to die in battle.

Mr. PATRICK. The hope is we will build up. Remember, we are not building an Army to get our men killed. We are building an Army to get it so that the people of the earth can see and hear, and no dictator will dare tread this way. Personally I would be glad to see the enlistment go as it was originally, from 18 to 63, and then all the nations of the earth could see and know that Uncle Sam was reaching out and putting on a real home guard. Then no Hitler, no matter how much he would like to invade this Nation, would try to establish a foothold in South America and come in and take the fine things that the eyes of totalitarian nations look upon so lustfully today.

Mr. McDOWELL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield.

Mr. McDOWELL. The gentleman will agree, I presume, that when a German soldier with flat feet and no teeth at all shoots you, you are just as dead as if he had been a perfect man? The German Army is filled with all kinds of men.

Mr. PATRICK. Oh, yes. But, of course, we are not in war yet. Those who are opposing this bill—I do not know whether the gentleman has determined yet whether he is for or against the bill——

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Is it not a fact that every quota set up by the War Department has today been met?

Mr. PATRICK. No; it has not. It lacks 105,000.

Mr. MILLER. Every quota set by The Adjutant General for each month of this year has been met, according to a letter on my desk this morning.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There has been a grave misunderstanding of the meaning of the word "quota." The War Department has tried to measure the effectiveness of the recruiting system over a long period of time. It has sent out word from time to time to the recruiting areas, "We hope you can get so many men next month. We expect you to get 5,000 in that area." That is put down as the quota. As a matter of fact, the Department wanted 10 times as many.

Mr. MILLER. I think they should have asked for more, then.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The word "quota" has been greatly misunderstood. The figures mentioned in the quotas were not the figures of the men needed. They were the figures which the War Department hoped that the recruiting service could get. It was a line to shoot at by the recruiting service. It is very misleading.

Mr. PATRICK. I got that same information and it is an interesting thing. And there is something else: For example, they got 30,000 one month—the best that has ever been done in the history of the Nation; but in that same month 7,000 finished their enlistments and went home. So the net increase was only 23,000. That 23,000 stands today as the best that has ever been done. Fifty-one thousand is what they really wanted. Because they said, "Try to get us this or try to get us that or the other," some called that the quota. Not because that is what they wanted, but that is what they hoped to be able to get from that corps area or this corps area.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. As a matter of fact, we have 263,000 in the Regular Army; approximately 240,000 in the National Guard; 116,000 Reserve Army officers. Mr. Knudsen testified Friday morning before the Ways and Means Committee that it will take until January 1, 1942, to equip an army of 750,000 men. Still the plan proposed to us is that we authorize recruiting of 400,000 October 1, 400,000 April 1, which is not taking at all into consideration the 600,000 we have on call now, and we will not have any equipment for them. We saw pictures in our Sunday papers with two tanks and a couple of trucks. Why should we take men from industry where they are producing wealth and needed equipment of the country and put them in the Army until we are ready to use them and until we know what the emergency is?

Mr. PATRICK. I think any school child in the United States who has studied it for 20 minutes can answer that question. The answer is we are not at war now. We are thankful to high heaven that we have seen it in time that we can get our men together and train them with whatever is available, so that instead of feeding them to the lion, as poor France did in some of those encounters over there, we will be prepared. There were cases of 10 Frenchmen being killed to 1 German soldier, because they were throwing the poor unprepared French boys in front of bands of steel and iron and flame, unprepared and unqualified.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again very briefly?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman spoke of the fate of the French Army. The gentleman from Alabama must know that France has had compulsory training as far back as 1927. Every time you went to any part of France you saw men under arms and training. As a matter of fact, France had the greatest army and the best trained army in the world. It was not lack of manpower that ruined the French Army.

Mr. PATRICK. Surely the gentleman does not mean to say that the destruction of an army of that kind was entirely due to "fifth column" activities.

Mr. MILLER. It was not due to lack of manpower.

Mr. PATRICK. It certainly soon became a lack of manpower when the casualties in some instances were as high as 7 and 8 to 1.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. How does the gentleman feel about 1-year enlistments? What does he believe should be our policy in that regard?

Mr. PATRICK. I am not a military expert, but I believe we should not have too many 1-year enlistments because of the vast and rapid turn-over involved. It is hoped to train 1,200,000 men through the selective-service program. To build up an Army of that size each year would take how many men a month? It seems to me it would create great confusion. Further, we must have our men better trained than they can be all in a 1-year period. Not only must we have raw recruits, but we must have as many 3-year men as possible. Another fact to bear in mind is that the conscription plan will not prevent voluntary enlistments. We will still need patriotic men willing to serve for 3 years.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield.

Mr. BENDER. The gentleman speaks of 1-year enlistments. Is it not a fact that the conscription provides for only 1 year of service?

Mr. PATRICK. The service clause of the bill as it now stands provides for only 1 year of training, that is true; but, as I say, the mere fact that we put the conscription plan into operation will not do away with the opportunity for men to enlist voluntarily; it will not interfere with anybody's enlisting for 3 years, anybody who feels the patriotic urge to do so. Such people will still be able to serve the Nation longer. I feel we should avoid too many short enlistments.

We need the guaranty of enough 3-year men to train the short-term men. We need the 3-year men as a foundation to work upon, to give us the safety and security of men used to Army methods. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot submit that request. There are other special orders pending.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL], is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield, to permit the gentleman to submit a unanimous consent request.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point my views on the question of conscription which are contrary to those held by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATRICK], who just addressed us.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PEACETIME CONSCRIPTION

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, we are hearing much in these days about conscription. Conscription—how I hate the word! It has the sound of a whip-lash upon the shoulders of a free people. It conveys the idea of a doubt upon American patriotism and duty. Obliterate that word from the vocabularies of the world and the war lords will have no soldiers—their tagged and numbered armies will disappear. As for peacetime conscription, the idea seems strange and out of place. Our country today is at peace. We want to remain so—we are preparing our country to maintain the peace that we are now enjoying and I have never a doubt that we will defend it from any foreign or domestic threat. But when it comes to conscription—to the drafting of our boys and men out of their daily occupations and duties into a standing army, I will not only have to be shown imminent cause, but doubly shown, before I will be for it.

THE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been privileged to serve my constituency for a period of 8 years. I was singularly honored by my colleagues at the end of my first term, when by the same process that made you Speaker, I was elected by the Members of the House of Representatives to become a member of the Ways and Means Committee, the most important and powerful committee in the Congress.

I am grateful to my constituents for the kindness and the confidence shown to me each and every time that I sought their favor and have been re-elected. I am appreciative of the fine feeling and spirit exhibited by the membership of this House for having elected me to the Committee on Ways and Means at the end of my first term. Of course, I am not an exception in this respect. Some very distinguished and able Members of the Congress have been previously so honored. Among these was a former member of this committee and a former member of the Cabinet, the Honorable William Jennings Bryan. Of course, I am not deserving of comparison with any such exceptional personage as the distinguished and eloquent Commoner, for my background was modest and obscure, my beginnings lowly and unrecognized.

The people of Michigan, Mr. Speaker, recognize the importance of my assignment and the honor which has been conferred upon me. The citizens of Detroit, especially those of the Fifteenth District are conscious of the fact that because of my place upon this committee I am in a position to safeguard the interests of one of the most important and the largest tax-paying districts in the Nation. These good citizens who have sent me to represent them know and understand that the Committee on Ways and Means is important because it passes upon and presents for consideration legislation that is vital. They understand full well that such legislation as might come from this committee enjoys precedence over other legislation which is considered by major and exclusive committees of this House.

I was privileged to take part in and protect the interests of my people in every tax and revenue measure which came before this committee since the Seventy-fourth Congress. I was directly and intimately occupied with the consideration of such important bills as the soldiers' bonus, the Social Security Act and subsequent amendments, National Industrial Recovery Act, reciprocal-trade agreements, Bituminous Coal Act, Railroad Retirement Act, and various other important bills reported by this committee. [Applause.]

I am indebted to the Librarian of the House of Representatives for the preparation of the record of distinguished congressmen who have risen to higher places within the structure of the United States Government after serving as members of the Ways and Means Committee. Among these we find the names not only of members of the Cabinet, the Supreme Court, and Speakers of the House, but also the names of Vice Presidents and even several Chief Executives of the United States whose names made history. I am proud that, as a committeeman, my name has been linked with theirs and appears on the official roster of the Ways and Means Committee among these distinguished former members.

It is interesting to note that within the span of 100 years, since the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union that 35 of her most distinguished citizens were called to service in the capacity of Chief Executive of the State or succeeded a regularly elected Governor. Twenty-eight of Michigan's sons were honored either by election or appointment to the Senate of the United States. One hundred and seventy-nine representatives were elected to directly represent and protect the interest of the people of the various congressional districts of Michigan in the Congress of the United States. An examination of the roll discloses the names of some of the foremost families who pioneered in Michigan, and who have made Michigan's glorious history. While there were 35 Governors of Michigan, 28 United States Senators from Michigan, and 179 Representatives in Congress from Michigan, there were only 12 in the history of the State who were elected to membership on the Ways and Means Committee.

Following is a list of present and former members: Omar D. Conger, William A. Howard, Henry Waldron, William C. Maybury, Justin R. Whiting, William A. Smith, Joseph W. Fordney, James C. McLaughlin, Austin Blair, Julius C. Burrows, Roy Woodruff, and John D. Dingell.

It will be noted that today there appear the names of two Michigan congressmen who are active members of this committee, that of my distinguished colleague, Roy Woodruff, a high-ranking member of the minority, and of your humble servant privileged to serve with the majority. Michigan enjoys a unique and influential position on this all important policy-making committee. Some very important States like Illinois, Ohio, and Texas, have but one member each. Thirty States have no representation while Michigan is one of the few States which has two members. I submit a list of these members in the order of their rank and standing on the committee, and the States which they represent:

1. Robert L. Doughton, chairman, North Carolina.
2. Thomas H. Cullen, New York.
3. Christopher D. Sullivan, New York.
4. John W. McCormack, Massachusetts.
5. Jere Cooper, Tennessee.
6. John W. Boehne, Jr., Indiana.
7. Wesley E. Disney, Oklahoma.
8. Frank H. Buck, California.
9. Richard M. Duncan, Missouri.
10. John D. Dingell, Michigan.
11. A. Willis Robertson, Virginia.
12. Paul H. Maloney, Louisiana.
13. Patrick J. Boland, Pennsylvania.
14. Milton H. West, Texas.
15. Raymond S. McKeough, Illinois.
16. Allen T. Treadway, Massachusetts.
17. Frank Crowther, New York.
18. Harold Knutson, Minnesota.
19. Daniel A. Reed, New York.
20. Roy O. Woodruff, Michigan.
21. Thomas A. Jenkins, Ohio.
22. Donald H. McLean, New Jersey.
23. Bertrand W. Gearhart, California.
24. Frank Carlson, Kansas.
25. Benjamin Jarrett, Pennsylvania.

While this committee is privileged to exercise the highest constitutional power and authority; that is, the power to tax and to formulate certain definite policies of the administration, it enjoys at the same time insofar as the majority members are concerned the power to create new committees subject to the ratification by the House of Representatives and to fill all committee vacancies on all standing committees. Each majority member of the Ways and Means Committee is designated by the chairman of the committee to exercise jurisdiction over a given territory involving one or more States, and it then becomes the responsibility of the member exercising such jurisdiction to nominate Members of Congress to various committees. I have been privileged to exercise discretion, and to nominate members from seven States; namely, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Idaho. Election to a given committee is dependent upon nomination by the member having jurisdiction over a given zone or area. Interesting and at the same time important to the people of Michigan is the fact that since I have been a member of the Ways and Means Committee and of the Committee on Committees I have succeeded in placing every Democratic Member of Congress elected from Michigan since 1934 upon an important and exclusive major committee.

The list follows showing former members of the Ways and Means Committee who have risen to the office of President, Vice President, became members of the Cabinet, served as Justices of the Supreme Court, or were elevated to the Speakership of the House of Representatives:

THE LATE SAMUEL E. WINSLOW

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, an outstanding citizen, a former Member of this House for 12 years, my great and good friend Samuel E. Winslow, a lifelong resident and civic and political leader of my home city of Worcester, died recently in his home environment, mourned by his host of friends there and throughout the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. And I am sure that among the present Members of the House who served here with "Sam," or "Colonel," Winslow, as he was known to them affectionately, they will share with me deep sorrow at his passing.

Notable among such Members is the able and distinguished majority leader the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], who served on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce when "Sam" Winslow was chairman of that great committee.

Colonel Winslow stemmed from colonial stock and was to the manner born a gentleman of the old school. He was affable, kindly, and tolerant, although strong and unyielding in his convictions which he would not compromise for personal advantage.

"Sam" Winslow's activities were multifarious, in all of which he stood out prominently as a leader, whether in college debates, whether in sports, in which he excelled in baseball and in football as a member of the old Harvard champion eleven, whether in business as an executive in many enterprises and civic movements, or whether as Member of Congress, with keen knowledge of national affairs, especially in relation to the tariff question, the varied problems of interstate and foreign commerce, the merchant marine, and the complexities of banking and currency.

Colonel Winslow retired from this House in 1925. He was appointed by President Hoover to be a member of the Board of Mediation, an appointment that met with general approval, for no man was ever better equipped by temperament and other personal characteristics than he for such exacting and delicate duty. Upon relinquishing that office at a ripe age and after a long life of constructive service to his fellow men and to his city, State, and Nation, he retired to his home there to live in retrospect and to content himself in making weekly newspaper contributions of his reminiscences from what he called Colonel Winslow's Easy Chair, and while thus engaged this gentleman, this lovable character, this American statesman and patriot, passed to his sure reward, leaving the legacy of a life well spent and an example of exalted citizenship worthy of emulation.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include an editorial and an article from a local paper relating to the life, character, and public service of Colonel Winslow.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The editorial and article referred to follow:

SAMUEL E. WINSLOW

The death of Samuel E. Winslow, for 12 years Member of Congress from this district, takes from the Worcester scene a man who has been prominent in its affairs in many ways for over half a century. Colonel Winslow, early in his young manhood, began to take part in the public and political life of the community, and he continued to take part in increasing measure as long as his days lasted.

He was of a genial disposition with a great fund of humor and ready wit, which made him an interesting figure in any gathering. He was much sought after as a toastmaster and as a speaker at public events. He had a host of friends because he was the sort of man who simply radiated friendship.

With all his prominence in business and in public life, and despite his marked affability, he was withal a modest man. Notwithstanding the hardening which comes with long service in public life, he was a sensitive man. He was, in an unostentatious way, a markedly religious man. There were many facets to his character.

His modesty and his dislike of ostentation is well evidenced in the letter of instructions he left with reference to his funeral. Here was a document written 9 years ago, and it evidently was well thought out, because he reaffirmed it only 2 years ago. He wanted none of the pomp and circumstance that so ofttimes go with the funeral of a public man. He wanted no church service, no outpouring of friends to show their respect, no expenditures for a great mass of flowers, nor any of the trappings that mark the obsequies of the prominent. Just a simple service at the crematory, a service just for his wife, his children, and their consorts, and his grandchildren—the immediate family and none others. That shows a side of the man which few knew. There were indeed, as we have said, many facets to his character.

The last few years, since his retirement from the United States Board of Mediation, his last public office, he had lived quietly at his former home in Leicester and later here in Worcester. The last 3 years he conducted a column in the Gazette, Colonel Winslow's Easy Chair, where he dispensed some of his knowledge of events in public life and some of his philosophy.

He loved the newspaper office. He liked to browse around its various editorial and reportorial offices, and he had become a much honored and highly regarded member of this newspaper family.

He had a full and colorful life. He will be missed in many a quarter. We shall miss his goings and comings here in the Telegram and Gazette. He was a character in this community—a character of worth and wholesomeness. His passing will bring real regret in many places, both modest and high, because Colonel Winslow's friends were all-inclusive.

COLONEL WINSLOW SUCCUMBS IN HOSPITAL—FORMER CONGRESSMAN PROMINENT IN POLITICAL LIFE FOR HALF CENTURY

Samuel Ellsworth Winslow, 78, prominent in the political life of the county, State, and Nation for more than half a centry, died at 4:30 o'clock this morning after a short illness. He was stricken with a shock at his apartment in the Hotel Bancroft July 9 and removed to City Hospital.

Colonel Winslow's request for a simple and private funeral service will be followed out by the family. The request was made in a statement prepared by himself in 1931 and recently discussed with members of his family and Rev. Dr. Maxwell Savage, who will officiate. In this statement Colonel Winslow said, "Although I am respectfully mindful of the general practice and the views of others, it would please me to be cared for, after death, in the simplest manner possible."

The body will be cremated and the ashes buried in Hope Cemetery.

Better known as "Colonel" or "Sam" to a host of friends throughout New England and in Washington, where he represented his congressional district 12 years, Mr. Winslow was a familiar figure in the civic and political life of Worcester for many years. After he retired from active participation in politics he kept in touch with national and local affairs of his party and was often consulted in an advisory capacity.

He was a Republican, and in his younger days had no peer as a campaigner. He could give and take with the best of his political adversaries, and in 1912 answered the demand of party leaders to redeem the district from the Democrats and consented to run for Congress. He was elected that year and continued to serve in Congress more than a decade.

EVENING GAZETTE WRITER

In recent years he had given the public some of the interesting and amusing incidents of his long and colorful career in a weekly column "Colonel Winslow's easy chair," in the Evening Gazette.

On June 5, 1937, he began making weekly contributions to the Gazette and his writings brought forth favorable comment from many sources.

Regarded as a leader in the National House, Mr. Winslow, as chairman of the United States Mediation Board for 8 years, was brought into the public eye as one of the outstanding public servants of the country. He was appointed to this board in 1930 by President Hoover.

He had a way of making friends even among his political opponents. He came by his politics naturally, as his father was four times mayor of Worcester.

In 1896 he was mentioned as the party candidate for lieutenant-governor.

When a pupil in one of the low grades in Worcester, he joined a drum corps organized by Mrs. George H. Ward, widow of Colonel Ward of the Fifteenth Massachusetts Regiment, who was killed in the Battle of Gettysburg. Later he became drum major of a corps of 125 Harvard students.

It was while a student in high school the deceased gained his first experience in politics. As election day came around he would go to the ward room in the Oxford Street School and get a list of those who had not voted and go after them in his father's carriage.

While at Williston Seminary he helped to organize political parades in the Garfield and Arthur Presidential campaign.

LEADER AT HARVARD

At Harvard, Mr. Winslow was a leader in many departments. He was editor of the Crimson and business manager of the Lampoon. He was a leader in the Republican Political Club of Harvard 2 years and organized the Harvard Machine Club. It was, however, in athletics he attracted public attention while in college. He was a giant in stature and a baseball and football playcr of exceptional ability.

In the year he was captain of the winning Harvard nine, it played 16 championship games, winning 10. In 1884 and 1885 he was a center rusher on the Harvard football eleven.

At college he also made his mark as a debater and political organizer.

He was a pitcher and captain of the Harvard baseball team that won the intercollegiate championship in 1885. He continued his interest in athletics down through the years and was frequently a spectator at the home games of the Washington Senators.

Six years ago he was one of a large committee of old-time ball players who greeted Connie Mack, venerable leader of the Philadelphia Athletics, when he brought his team to a home-coming reception in North Brookfield. Colonel Winslow, the same age as Connie, was always an admirer of the latter.

Colonel Winslow was prominent in the club and social life of Harvard, being a member of the Delta Kappa Epsilon, Zeta Pi, the Hasty Pudding Club, and other organizations.

ENTERED FATHER'S BUSINESS

After his graduation from Harvard, he traveled in Europe several months, returning to engage in business in Worcester in 1886. He went into business with his father as secretary and clerk of the Samuel Winslow Skate Manufacturing Co. After an experience in various departments of the business, he went on the road as a salesman. He was also a buyer, traveling throughout the United States, and later became president of the company.

In addition he became active in many of the business enterprises of his home city, being a director of the United States Envelope Co. and the State Mutual Life Assurance Co. of Worcester, the Worcester Consolidated Street Railway, and the Mechanics Bank.

He was born in Worcester April 11, 1862, the son of Samuel and Mary Weeks (Robbins) Winslow. He was educated in the public schools and graduated from Worcester High School as president of his class in 1880. He then attended Williston Seminary, where he was class president, and graduated bachelor of arts from Harvard in the class of 1885.

On his father's side he was a descendant of Kenelm Winslow, one of the Pilgrim fathers and a brother of Edward Winslow, one of the Governors of the Plymouth Colony.

Colonel Winslow lived at 10 Linden Street, Worcester, and maintained Stonewall farm atop Leicester Hill, Leicester, long recognized as one of the show places of Worcester County. The residence is a stately, dignified, and handsomely proportioned mansion of the true colonial style and has spacious lawns and extensive grounds. The estate of 24 acres was acquired by Leicester Academy in October 1939, and the main house made over for a residence for faculty members and students.

He was associated with Worcester City Hospital 22 years, 21 as a trustee, and was a former president of the board of trustees. He was a member of the executive committee of Leicester Academy, a trustee of Worcester Academy, a member of the Worcester County Musical Association, and a vice president of Worcester Agricultural Society.

ON GOVERNOR'S STAFF

In religion, Mr. Winslow was a Unitarian.

He was an aide-de-camp on the staff of Gov. J. Q. A. Brackett, with the rank of colonel in 1890, was chairman of the Republican City Committee of Worcester from 1890 to 1892, and of the Massachusetts Republican Committee from 1893 to 1894.

In 1908 he was a delegate to the National Republican Convention at Chicago.

Colonel Winslow was associated with several clubs, including the Worcester, Commonwealth, Automobile, Tatnuck Country, Worcester Country, Quinsigamond Boat, the Harvard Clubs of Boston, Worcester, New York, and Washington, the Metropolitan, Chevy Chase, and National Press Clubs of Washington, the Worcester Grange, and many other organizations for special purposes.

Mr. Winslow, April 17, 1889, married Bertha Lucenia Russell, daughter of Col. Edward J. and Lucenia (Prouty) Russell, of Worcester. Six children were born to them, Samuel 2d dying in infancy.

He is survived by his widow; one daughter, Dorothy W., wife of William H. Sawyer, Jr.; four sons, Russell Winslow, of Chicago, Ill., Samuel E. Winslow, Jr., of Brookline, and John and Kenelm Winslow, of Worcester; eight grandchildren; and one great-grandchild.

TIRELESS WORKER

George F. Booth, writing of "Sam" Winslow in 1912, had this to say: "He is a tireless worker. He is one of the solid businessmen of Worcester. Next to the skate business he loves politics and is never so happy as when in the thick of a political campaign. He is an aggressive fighter, but, withal, diplomatic, a good organizer, and a good mixer."

"Many men who have occupied places of high honor in the political life of the city, county, and State owe much to the energetic work of Mr. Winslow. He has been fortunate in leading in the fights for others.

"In Congress Mr. Winslow did much to protect the manufacturing interests of the New England States against encroachment by the South. He was in Congress at the time the Underwood tariff bill was under consideration, which, some seemed to think at that time, was bound to destroy the prosperity of the North. It was said of him then if New England had not been represented by men like Colonel Winslow the Underwood bill would have been much more drastic.

"He took a big part in framing the Currency Act, which eventually revolutionized the financial system of the United States.

"His knowledge of finance and currency, coupled with his experience in business, was worth much to the committee that had the bill in charge.

"He was regarded as one of the most faithful of Massachusetts men in Congress. He was in his seat day after day, doing what he could to assist in unraveling many of the issues of the day. It was because of the work done by calm-minded thinking men like Colonel Winslow the strict neutrality of the United States was made possible prior to the first World War.

"The advice of Congressman Winslow when the merchant marine bill was before the House, that being one of the direct results of the war in Europe, was of great importance. He stood out at that time as one of the efficient members whose knowledge of business conditions generally, and whose ability to face a crisis, were at the disposal of the Nation, regardless of party ties or partisan inclination."

Congressman Winslow, although a Republican of the old school, had some strength among the Democrats. He gained this because of his kindly disposition and fair-minded methods of dealing with labor. His genial personality made friends for him among all parties. The result of that was shown in the 1912 campaign, when, with the Republican Party splitting everywhere, Mr. Winslow had no difficulty in winning election.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

SHOULD THE PRESIDENT HAVE A THIRD TERM?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the question of whether we should elect a President for a third term is the most important issue of the 1940 campaign. It is an American tradition almost universally accepted that no man should seek his third term as President. Most Americans adhere tenaciously to this tradition and even those who might concede that under some circumstances this tradition might be relaxed, will insist that it should be relaxed only in a case of great national emergency or in a case where the services of the incumbent are indispensable.

Is there such an emergency? Is Mr. Roosevelt indispensable? If these are the two exceptions and the only two let us examine them carefully.

EMERGENCY

Ever since the New Deal came into power we have heard the word "emergency." Nearly all legislation has been demanded as an "emergency" and all mistakes have been justified as "emergencies."

If there is an emergency calling for Mr. Roosevelt's election for a third term it must arise from war conditions or from economic conditions such as relief, W. P. A. and unemployment.

WAR CONDITIONS

The manner in which Mr. Roosevelt has handled the war situation has brought more criticism than any other one matter. He has been quite generally condemned for his policies and more especially for his personal conversations and conduct. There can be no doubt that the American people quite generally believe that he is strongly pro-war. This is proved by the almost universal demand of the people that Congress stay in session in spite of the President's wish that Congress adjourn. The people are afraid of the President's war policies. Therefore war emergency arises from the fact that Mr. Roosevelt is in office and not from any fear that he may not continue in office.

RELIEF, W. P. A., AND UNEMPLOYMENT

The fact that conditions calling for relief and W. P. A. assistance are yet very grave problems in our country prove that the New Deal has not solved these problems and that if there is an emergency it is such because of the New Deal inefficiency. Unemployment has been an emergency and it is an emergency now. The 8 years of Mr. Roosevelt's administration has not removed the emergency, for unemployment is as great now as formerly. This emergency will best be removed by the restoration to power of the Republican Party.

INDISPENSABLE

Is Mr. Roosevelt indispensable? In a speech in New York on November 3, 1932, Mr. Roosevelt himself, quoting President Wilson, said:

There is no indispensable man.

To admit that any one man is indispensable to the perpetuity of our Government is to admit that our system of government is wrong. It is to admit that a democracy or republic cannot function. It is an admission that our country must have a dictator or a one-man government. Mr. Roosevelt is not indispensable. No man since the foundation of the Government has been indispensable. Our country went right on when Washington retired, and it went right on when Lincoln died. Anyone who argues that Roosevelt or any other man is indispensable should hang his head in shame. The glorious past of this Republic refutes it, and the serious prospects of the future protests against it. With freedom's soil beneath our feet and freedom's banner floating over us we cannot be worthy of freedom's blessings if we believe that there is within our citizenship but one man capable of leadership. If the Democratic Party is committed to such a philosophy it does not deserve to succeed. If there is but one man capable of leading America what will we do if he should die? A most dismal prospect it would be.

Roosevelt did not receive his third-term nomination by reason of any great ground swell of public sentiment but by reason of a well-planned and well-executed political campaign where the power and influence of public funds and public patronage was exerted with terrific effect on the candidacies of other well-qualified men. That prominent Democrats such as Vice President Garner and Postmaster Farley and ex-Governor White, of Ohio, and thousands of others looked with disfavor on the third-term candidacy of Mr. Roosevelt prove that there was no emergency or any other condition that demanded that Mr. Roosevelt be nominated for his third term.

The crass arrogance and wasteful extravagance of the New Deal and the high-handed political tyranny manifested in the Chicago convention convinces any reasonable mind that Mr. Roosevelt's nomination was effected by reason of "blitzkrieg" methods, and in spite of the wishes of the people.

The great Washington no doubt could have had a third consecutive term, but he declined it emphatically. Although Jefferson was popular, he would not have a third term because he had on many previous occasions indicated his opposition to it and gave most convincing reasons for his position. Andrew Jackson also was popular, but he had recommended in each of his annual messages to Congress that the Constitution be amended to provide for a single term of 4 or 6 years. I have seen it in print that Mr. Coolidge could have had a third term. I think this is doubtful. At any rate, Mr. Coolidge had not served two full consecutive terms. Theodore Roosevelt contested for what might be considered as a third term, although he had not served two full terms, but it was not for a third consecutive term. Grant reluctantly permitted himself to be considered for the nomination for a third full term, but it was not consecutive, and he was not nominated. The danger from a third term comes from its being consecutive. Three nonconsecutive terms would not be fraught with the dangers from bureaucracy and dictatorship that would attend three consecutive terms. All our two-term Presidents have declined to consider three consecutive terms, and those who considered a third nonconsecutive term were emphatically denied it.

Mr. Roosevelt refuses to emulate Washington or Jefferson and turns his back on the admonitions of Andrew Jackson, who is his model President and ideal American. How different the positive, thrifty, and determined Jackson and the insincere, prodigal, and fickle Roosevelt!

He now gives no heed to the Democratic platform of 1912 on which Woodrow Wilson was elected and which says:

> No man should be eligible for a third term of the Presidential office.

That platform also advocated a constitutional amendment as follows:

> We favor the single Presidential term and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection and we pledge the candidate of the convention to this principle.

Woodrow Wilson ran on that platform but accepted his second term. Mr. Roosevelt stood for that platform, yet he will accept a third term.

In 1896 the Democratic convention adopted a plank as follows:

> We declare it to be the unwritten law of the Republic established by custom and usage of a hundred years, and sanctioned by the example of the greatest and wisest of those who founded and maintained our Government, that no man should be elected for a third term of the Presidential office.

In 1928 when it appeared that Mr. Coolidge might aspire to a third term, the Senate of the United States adopted a resolution against a third term. This was supported by practically all of the Democrats in the Senate. The resolution is as follows:

> Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the Presidential office after their second term, has become, by a universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions; and be it further
> Resolved, That the State commends observance of this precedent by the President.

This was only a few years ago. Many of the Democratic Senators who voted for this resolution then are yet Members of that great body. Among them are Senators ASHURST, (Dear ALBEN) BARKLEY, GLASS, HARRISON, KING, MCKELLAR, NEELY, PITTMAN, SHEPPARD, SMITH, THOMAS of Oklahoma, TYDINGS, and WHEELER. No doubt each of these great Democrats, all friends of the President, will find it difficult to square that vote with an open advocacy of his candidacy for a third term. Senator NORRIS also voted for that resolution, but somehow it seems he has changed his mind, and argues vigorously for a third term for Roosevelt. It will be interesting to know his excuse for his inconsistency. It will be difficult for him to explain how a procedure that in 1928 was "unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with danger to our free institutions" is wise, patriotic, and fraught with great and everlasting benefits to the Republic in 1940. Verily, verily "consistency thou art a jewel."

Whether the best interests of the Republic demand the reelection of the present incumbent for his third consecutive term should not be decided upon the present-day economic conditions. This is a much larger question than personal interests or party success. It is beyond and outside of the personality or the personal welfare of the man. It is a matter that was given much consideration in the Constitutional Convention of 1787. Hamilton favored a strong National Government with long tenure for the President. His position had practically no support. Jefferson, whose opposition to a monarchy was a passion with him, although he was in Europe when the Constitution was being written, through his followers was successful, early in the Convention, in having the tenure fixed at one term of 7 years with no succession. This provision remained in the tentative draft of the Constitution until September 1, 2 days before the final adjournment of the Convention, when the term was reduced to 4 years with no mention of additional terms. Of this change Jefferson, many years later, still strongly convinced that he was right, said:

> My wish therefore was that the President should be elected for 7 years, and be ineligible afterward. This term I thought sufficient to enable him, with the concurrence of the legislature, to carry through and establish any system of improvement he should propose for the general good. But the practice adopted I think is better, allowing his continuance for 8 years, with a liability to be dropped at the half-way of the term, making a period of probation.

Jefferson, further commenting on this question of whether the best interests of the Republic demand the retention of any one man in the Presidency for three terms, said:

> If some termination to the services of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for 4 years, will in fact become for life; and history shows how easily that degenerates into an inheritance.

When Jefferson said, "His office, nominally for 4 years, will, in fact, become for life," he knew what we know, that if we ever break this third-term rule for a President he will be President for life, if he desires it. Roosevelt, with his abundant ego, would not turn it down.

Some men may be strong enough to carry on the democratic processes of a government for life, but history does not name one. On the contrary, history shows where bureaucracy has throttled the strongest. When the executive usurps the other branches and the orderly processes of government fail, the Constitution is impotent. An impotent constitution in the hands of a senile, benevolent dictator is as impotent as in the hands of a despotic dictator. When a dictator, benevolent or despotic, comes in, the Constitution goes out.

Philosophically Jefferson was sound, and practically he was sound when he said:

> Should a President consent to be a candidate for a third election, I trust he would be rejected on this demonstration of ambitious views.

It is irresistible that if Jefferson were living to vote in November he would not vote for Roosevelt, but like many sincere Democrats of this day he would vote for Willkie.

All down through our history are many important incidents that prove how loyal our people and our Presidents have been to this tradition established by Washington. William Henry Harrison took office pledged to one term only. Rutherford B. Hayes favored only one term for a President and was not a candidate for a second term. Cleveland, in his characteristic strong language, declared himself against a third term. McKinley said, "I am not and will not be a candidate for a third term." Franklin D. Roosevelt when he entered upon his second term apparently adhered to this tradition as closely as he ever adhered to any policy or principle. He said on March 4, 1937, on the occasion of his Victory Dinner and when he was entering upon his second term:

I am by no means satisfied with having twice been elected President of the United States by very large majorities. I have an even greater ambition. My ambition relates to January 20, 1941. My great ambition on January 20, 1941, is to turn over this desk and chair in the White House to my successor.

It is hard to conceive that a President would fail to keep his promise. Although there is no constitutional provision prohibiting a third-term candidacy, yet there is no provision sanctioning it. We do know that a large majority of the members of the Constitutional Convention did not favor long tenure. We hope that the people will on election day take such action as will assist Mr. Roosevelt to realize his greatest of all ambitions—to turn over his chair in the White House to his successor on January 20, 1941. In view of the almost unanimous opposition to a third term of all classes of people from George Washington down to the present time, the President should not demand a third term. With great unrest in the world we, of all nations, should not encourage internal unrest and discord. Dictatorships thrive on discord and unrest. They stalk across the world, recognizing neither right nor justice, disregarding all promises, however solemnly entered into, defying nature, and denying God. All this comes from a usurpation of executive power.

To break the time-honored custom of two terms for a President and to elect him for a third, a fourth, and a fifth term would launch us on a course that might irresistibly lead us to national destruction. Unlike the legislative and judicial branches of the Government, the executive branch is one man only. This one man is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. He names the Secretary of State who is our spokesman in all delicate international matters. He names the Secretary of the Treasury, who might improperly take from the people their right to control the purse strings of the Nation. He names the Attorney General, who is the legal representative of the Government in all its activities. To give him the additional power that comes from the control of a million Federal employees, federated into bureaus, by controlling their action for a long and uncertain tenure is a danger which we should recognize before it is too late.

Totalitarianism inevitably displaces individual freedom of action in business, and chokes free speech, and stifles free worship. God forbid that the time may ever come in America when only one man shall be considered competent to be President. And God forbid that the time shall ever come when any one man shall have such power as to enable him to say, "I am the state." [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include some quotations from Army experts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 30 there appears a short speech made by Senator GUFFEY, of Pennsylvania. He refers to an editorial appearing in the Philadelphia Record dated July 29, 1940, and he states:

It is an open letter addressed to Wendell Willkie, and when Willkie replies I shall be very glad to place his reply in the RECORD.

It is seldom that I have felt impelled to make an answer to any statement made by any Senator or Congressman with reference to some other individual, and I would not take it upon myself to make answer to this statement of Senator GUFFEY except for the fact that I know something about the matter discussed in the editorial. It is likely that because of my connection with the investigation of the T. V. A. that I would know more about this than practically any other Congressman. Of course, I am not speaking for Mr. Willkie, and it is probable that Mr. Willkie has never seen the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on this subject or the Philadelphia Record editorial.

If Senator GUFFEY expected Mr. Willkie to answer the question he asked, which is, "Who killed the paper that fought Willkie?" I will say that he probably will not receive any answer from Mr. Willkie to such an inconsequential question. But in my remarks I propose to ask a few questions myself. My first question is to Senator GUFFEY as to how he came to insert in the RECORD this editorial from the Philadelphia paper. For fear he does not answer, I will say that it is my guess that he did this at the suggestion of one Francis Biddle. Then I wish to ask Mr. Francis Biddle two questions, and when he answers them to Mr. GUFFEY I should be glad to see them appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. My first question is, Is it not true that Francis Biddle supplied the information to the Philadelphia paper for the editorial above referred to? Second, Did Francis Biddle own stock in the Chattanooga News at the time he ordered the investigation of that paper's competitor? If he did not own it at that time, how soon after the investigation was it that he bought stock in this paper that Senator GUFFEY is complaining about that was killed by someone?

Now, let me give you some facts. One Francis Biddle in 1938 was employed as general counsel by the congressional committee appointed to investigate the T. V. A. I was a member of that committee. I objected to the appointment of Mr. Biddle for various reasons. I maintained that he would not make a fair investigation, and my judgment was vindicated in this respect at every turn during the whole investigation. It was well recognized by any impartial observer that he was at all times cooperating with the T. V. A. officials and its attorneys and at no time attempted to make a fair examination but, on the contrary, bent his every energy to justify the T. V. A. instead of making a fair investigation.

Late in the investigation he insisted that the committee go down from Knoxville to Chattanooga to make some investigations there. So far as I am concerned no definite information was given to the committee as to what was expected to be investigated and what was to be done on this trip to Chattanooga. When we arrived there we found that Mr. Biddle had already sent down to Chattanooga a large number of snoopers and investigators who were not known to at least three members of the committee and probably not known to any members of the committee. These men had been in Chattanooga making a snooping investigation into the activities of one newspaper, to wit, the Chattanooga Free Press. This paper was a competitor of the Chattanooga News. Two years before there had been a very bitter fight in Chattanooga over the proposition of whether the city would buy out the facilities of a power company which was serving the city of Chattanooga and which was at that time a part of the Commonwealth and Southern system, of which Mr. Willkie was the active head. This contest was decided by an election held in the city, the result of which found its way into the courts. Charges and countercharges were filed by the different groups interested. It developed at the hearing that the grand jury 2 years before had considered the whole matter and had done nothing about it and it was also brought out in the hearings that those whose duty it was to file reports as to expenditures incurred in the election had filed the same in the proper way and at the proper places. Just why this man Biddle should want to drag the committee down to Chattanooga to make this investigation was always a mystery to me until after October 1, 1939, when the Chattanooga News of Tennessee filed its report giving a list of its stockholders and it appeared at that time that Mr. Francis Biddle was one of the stockholders of the Chattanooga News. Apparently he called the investigation of the Chattanooga Free Press with the hope that he could scandalize it in some way so as to break it up or so that he might bring out some filth that his strong-armed investigators might have raked together or put together. The whole investigation fell flat when it was brought out that these strong-armed investigators, some of whom were supposed to be J. Edgar Hoover men, had been dined at the home of one George Fort Milton, who was the editor and publisher of the Chattanooga News. Mr. Biddle subpenaed the officials of the Chattanooga Free Press and others that he could embarrass, but he did not call the pompous George Fort Milton. In order to have both sides of the story I decided that we would subpena this gentleman. He admitted that he had been invited up to Knoxville and had a conference with Mr. Biddle and that they had arranged that Biddle should send his men down to Chattanooga and investigate his competitor. Whether by arrangement or by accident these investigators came to the Chattanooga Free Press when its editor and manager was away and strong-armed themselves into the banks and other institutions in Chattanooga in an effort to pry into all of the financial and business affairs of those connected with the Free Press.

To make a long story short the facts brought out in the investigation indicated clearly that it was a wild-goose chase gotten into purely for spite. Francis Biddle should not have made that investigation without the knowledge and approval of the investigating committee. The fact that he did arrange for it clandestinely condemns him in the mind of any fair-minded person. If he owned stock in the Chattanooga News at the time he called this clandestine investigation of the Chattanooga Free Press his conduct was extremely reprehensible. He should be called to give what the facts are in that connection. If he did not own the stock at that time but had bargained for it his conduct would be more reprehensible. If during these investigations he made any arrangements to buy stock in this company his conduct would also be reprehensible. And if he bought the stock after the investigation was over I should like to know what his excuse would be for making such a purchase because he could not have made it for investment purposes because it was well known at the time when the committee was in Chattanooga that the Chattanooga News was on its last legs financially. The News blew up on about the 1st of December 1939, which was about 2 months after the statement appeared showing that Biddle had stock in it.

Wendell Willkie did not kill the Chattanooga News. It died because of the incompetency of its managers. If the Chattanooga News spent practically all of its time in lambasting Mr. Willkie and his interests, it would be entirely natural if these interests would fight back. Anybody who fights Wendell Willkie ought to know that he is fighting a real fighter.

My advice to Senator GUFFEY and to Francis Biddle is that if they want to battle Wendell Willkie that they get out in the open and start. They will find in their contest from now to November that such tactics as they employ will not win for them. They will find that Willkie has always been a two-fisted fighter and that their muck-raking methods will not avail them anything.

Again I call on Senator GUFFEY and Francis Biddle to answer the questions that I have hereinbefore asked of them. [Applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MAHON (at the request of Mr. THOMASON), for 5 days, on account of official business, being member of the Appropriations Committee inspecting Army posts.

To Mr. SHANLEY, for 2 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska, for 3 days, on account of engagement in his district.

To Mr. ARNOLD, indefinitely, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an address by me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to include in my remarks an editorial appearing in the Washington Post of last Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS]?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, today much to my regret the House tabled a privileged resolution I introduced which called for a weekly report with reference to the progress of national defense by the President's National Advisory Committee on National Defense. The editorial in the Post speaks with praise of the committee because they broadcasted some points on their progress on Thursday night. Mr. David Lawrence states in tonight's Star that it was not candid but I am sure it was interesting. I did not hear it. I am sure the Post would feel that the Congress should be informed first of what is going on. And informed regularly. Many may not be in a position to listen to broadcasts—but the Congress certainly should be kept informed of what is accomplished or not accomplished. Lack of knowledge of the unpreparedness of the countries in Europe is responsible for their tragic plight. We cannot afford to let that happen in America.

Mr. Speaker, I also believe that the public should realize fully what is being done so far as national defense is concerned and they should be informed as to what is being actually accomplished and not just by radio addresses, interesting as they may be. If the public were kept fully advised the task would be greatly speeded up and facilitated because the people of America want to do their part in the national defense. If the defense is not progressing true Americans want to know. Americans are intensely patriotic, they always rise to any emergency. The Members of Congress will be taken to task if they do not do their part in pushing ahead with the defense program. They must see that America is not kept in the dark; they must not be kept in the dark themselves. I ask the Members if they do not think they are placing themselves in a rather ridiculous position if constituents ask or write them about the progress of our preparedness when they must answer. I heard thus and so over the radio, or I received that information in a press release. I ask the Members in all seriousness if, having appropriated billions upon billions for national defense, they then are giving up their duty and their control of the defense policy of the United States. Remember, America will judge us not just for today but for tomorrow. Certainly we are unprepared to defend ourselves today, and totally without excuse. I have believed always it is far cheaper to be overprepared than to be caught unprepared as we are today when it seems that the entire world is caught in a revolution. The Congress must not lay down the reins of leadership. The Congress must guide and guard the country in these perilous times.

The following is the article from the Washington Post of Saturday:

[From the Washington Post of August 10, 1940]

A CANDID REPORT

The National Defense Advisory Commission is taking the public into its confidence by giving out certain pertinent facts concerning the preparedness program. The interview with various members of the Commission broadcast on Thursday was reassuring because no extravagant claims were made and there was no effort to minimize the difficulty of the task ahead.

Mr. Knudsen reported the production of airplanes to be approximately 900 per month. An insignificant output compared with the goal set by the President. But he expects production to have been stepped up to 1,500 planes monthly by the first of the year. That is an encouraging outlook. It is also reassuring to hear that the number of workers in aircraft factories has increased nearly one-third since last January.

Mr. Knudsen's information about production progress was supplemented by Mr. Hillman's discussion of plans for training skilled workers. Mr. Stettinius dealt with the procurement of essential raw materials needed for the manufacture of thousands of required articles. He confessed frankly that the mobilization and coordination of industry for defense purposes would be a long job and not an easy one. "It calls for full cooperation and patience," he said.

By giving the public detailed reports of progress at frequent intervals the Commission should be able to scotch unfounded rumors of an alarmist nature about the defense program. It should not hesitate, however, to expose weaknesses of the defense organization that call for the remedial action afforded by an aroused public opinion.

Since the Commission acts only in an advisory capacity to regular Government agencies, it is in a position to take an objective critical view of actual accomplishments. Its usefulness will undoubtedly be enhanced by maintaining an objective attitude and sharing its information with the public.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

A joint resolution of the Senate of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO COORDINATING COUNCIL FOR PEACE,
San Francisco, Calif., July 17, 1940.

Senator SHERIDAN DOWNEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR DOWNEY: Under separate cover we have sent you by express a petition signed by 19,667 individuals, addressed to the President of the United States and to the Congress, as follows:

We, the people, in order to build a steel wall of defense against the European war threat to America's peace, send out our message: The Yanks are not coming!

We, the people, raise our voices to declare: We want no more war profiteering, no more gold-star mothers, no more American youth killing and being killed, no more miles of white crosses on foreign soil, no more tombs in Arlington to an "Unknown Soldier."

We want the Bill of Rights and guaranties that we will not be deprived of our inalienable rights of free speech, press, and assemblage.

We want America to keep out of this war and we want our Government to do all that is humanly possible to stop the war.

We want peace!

We ask that this resolution and the number of signers be memorialized in Congress and be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. We further request that you have the original petitions presented to President Franklin D. Roosevelt. Enclosed covering letter to the President.

Will you please advise our council when this has been done?

Very truly yours,

SAN FRANCISCO COORDINATION COUNCIL FOR PEACE,
Rev. HERRICK J. LANE, Chairman.
DOROTHEA M. SAWVELLE, Secretary-Treasurer.

To the table:

To the Congress of the United States of America, Washington, D. C.

CONGRESSMEN: We, as citizens of the United States of America, demand of you, our elected representatives, that you vote against the compulsory military training bill (the Burke-Wadsworth bill, S. 4164) as unconstitutional, as dictatorial, as un-American.

STATEMENT BY EXECUTIVE BOARD OF INDIANA STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR

Mr. MINTON presented a statement by the executive board of Indiana State Federation of Labor, relative to conscription, etc., which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The executive board of the Indiana State Federation of Labor, having earnestly and thoughtfully considered the question of national defense, adds its endorsement to that of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor of the general defense program adopted by the Congress of the United States.

We favor preparedness adequate to meet possible attack, either military or economic, by any world power or possible combination of world powers. We share the common alarm that conquering the Americas, the last bulwark of democracy, may become an objective of the totalitarian powers now engaged in the destruction of political freedom, culture, and the common rights of man in Europe and Asia.

We also fear an uncontrolled development of a vast war machine in America that may insidiously encroach upon the prerogatives of the people to determine general policies affecting the destiny of America and the Western Hemisphere.

We therefore favor setting up civilian controls to prevent the military from, either intentionally or from misdirected enthusiasm, usurping the powers reserved to Congress.

We fear that if recruiting of personnel to man the equipment of mechanized implements of war is left on a voluntary basis, that flag waving and economic pressure will tend to drive the unemployed and the sons of the less fortunate into military service, while the sons of the wealthy and powerful will remain in civilian life on some pretext or other.

We therefore endorse a selective-service law for preparedness to include persons ranging from the age of 18 to 65, not only for actual military service but also for the production of materials essential to national defense.

It follows that we favor the enactment of necessary legislation to enable the Government to draft men, money, plants, equipment, raw materials, transportation, and all other essential facilities to advance the preparedness program and conduct a defensive war in case of attack.

We hereby go on record as favoring the selective-service law with the proviso that adequate compensation for enlisted men to protect their investments, their homes, insurance estates, and other economic advantages which they have created for themselves and their families by their labors.

We demand that selections for service shall be conducted by committees representative of all walks of life and all political and religious points of view, except those who deny God and oppose the fundamental principles of democracy.

We believe it is wise to have some regulations established by the executive branch of the Government with military approval to govern such committees to prevent undue exemptions and personal favoritism. We will thus avoid a situation where any section of the country or group of people carry a greater burden than other sections and other groups.

We demand that such committees shall be localized insofar as possible and shall function with the advice of the military but shall not be subject to military dominance or orders.

We call upon the organized labor movement in Indiana to rally to the Nation's defense, but to be ever watchful that a national emergency shall not be used by the enemies of labor to destroy the gains made by 53 years of collective struggle.

INTERVIEW WITH SENATOR AUSTIN ON NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, last night in the program of the Washington Merry-Go-Round Radio Forum broadcast over the National Broadcasting hookup, I was interviewed by Drew Pearson and Bob Allen on the subject of National Defense, which is now under consideration in the Senate. The matter is of public importance, and I should like my colleagues to know my position. I therefore ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point my reply to the interrogatories.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ALLEN. Now, Drew, we have been talking about taxes and national defense and conscription. It occurs to me that the man who can talk about these problems perhaps better than almost anyone else is one of the most important leaders on Capitol Hill, Senator AUSTIN. Senator AUSTIN, as you know, is assistant Republican leader, and he occupies a unique position. He is on the Military Affairs Committee, which is extremely vital at this moment in our history, and also he occupies key posts on other important committees, such as the Judiciary and Interstate Commerce. But the fine thing about Senator AUSTIN, in my opinion—and somewhat unique among Senators—is that although he can fight furiously, he fights fair. For instance, he fought President Roosevelt vigorously on the Supreme Court bill, but has been one of the President's most ardent supporters when it comes to national defense. Like that Granite State from which he comes, Vermont, Senator AUSTIN can always be depended upon by his colleagues to fight the Nation's legislative battles fair, square, and intelligently. It is a great pleasure to have him as our guest speaker tonight, and so we introduce Senator AUSTIN.

Senator AUSTIN. Delighted to be with you gentlemen. Your column has become a daily habit in my household. It is very informative and entertaining to the American public. I wish you equal success with this new venture of yours.

Question. Senator, in regard to national defense, can you tell us whether that is making real progress?

Answer. I think we are moving. There has been terrific inertia in this country, but I believe we have overcome it. People write in to me, knowing my views, and wanting to know why we are not moving faster. But on the whole I believe we have made real progress. For instance, when we passed a bill not long ago doubling our Navy, it was a tremendous thing. There wasn't much shouting about it or tearing of hair in Congress. It was done quietly and rather grimly, and the public may not have realized its entire significance. But when we decided that we were going to keep a navy both in the Atlantic and in the Pacific, we served notice on the world that we intended to qualify ourselves, not merely for temporary immunity from war but for enduring security. We made a decision to become an influential party to any peace settlement. We gave to the voice of the United States authority in the negotiations rearranging world trade and planning for the long future. We served notice that we intended to preserve within the New World our own system of democracy and peace.

Question. Speaking of the Western Hemisphere and the New World, Senator, do you think that war is likely to come over here?

Answer. The best illustration of that is the island of Martinique. We thought of it only as the frame for Mount Pelee—a place where eruptions were only volcanic—an island only 50 miles long and averaging 20 miles wide, it slumbered in its azure sea until it was suddenly awakened in the character of a political volcano. It became an important focal point on the map of the Western Hemisphere. French ships carrying the French gold reserve and American airplanes dodged in and out of the islands of the Caribbean Sea and finally found refuge in this French island. Now they are cornered there, and, fortunately, our British friends have refrained from any act of war. Now these French ships are the war prize of Germany. We are faced with a situation in which Britain and Germany actually are within shooting distance in a body of water most vital to the United States and adjacent to the Panama Canal. No; to further answer your question, I don't see how it is possible for us to ignore the fact that war may come to the Western Hemisphere. Prudence requires government to act on the theory that war would come if the United States were unprepared.

Question. Senator, I think that the American public has become more concerned about Latin America since the Habana Conference. I gather from what you say that you are concerned about possible Nazi encroachment there. Can you give us any details?

Answer. Known facts made public in the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and elsewhere dictate protective action at once. I should say the most significant situation to watch in South America is the Nazi-Fascist air lines. We have already seen in Europe the great part which the air has played in the conquest of Poland, Holland, Belgium, and France. In South America it is no secret that Germany has established her commercial air lines—the Condor, the Lufthansa, and others—in such a way that she already has air bases, gasoline supplies, interchangeable parts, and actual planes in operation in this vital and strategic area. If Germany wished to send a large number of four-motored bombing planes through Latin America across our southern boundaries, she would have the facilities to do so. In Ecuador there is the Sedta Line, run entirely by Germany, and which has established routes to distant jungle areas in the country. Since no one lives in these jungles, since there can be no trade, there is only one reason for such routes. They are of strategic military importance. Again in Colombia there is the Scadta Line, until recently manned 95 percent by German pilots sent out in rotation from Berlin. Fortunately, an American firm has now acted rather belatedly under pressure of the State Department to clean out these German aviators. If we consider the Panama Canal the lifeline of American defense—and I think the entire Nation agrees with that—then we must bear in mind that one or two carefully placed bombs can blow up the locks of the Canal and put it out of commission for 2 or 3 months. Therefore, German air lines in South America, to say nothing of the glider clubs, the cycling clubs—all of which train for the new Nazi strategy of parachutists—must be a matter of grave concern to the United States. The world revolution, in which we are already enmeshed, has made progress there. It breaks down the morale of the people. It prepares for quick conquest by teaching the people not to prepare to fight—not to defend their country. It pacifies by teaching that there is no peril.

Question. Senator, General Marshall, and to a certain extent also, Secretary of War Stimson, have indicated that the United States faces grave danger from foreign invasion as early as this fall. Can you tell us your views on that?

Answer. It seems to me we must give Hitler the benefit of the characteristics which he has already portrayed—extreme shrewdness, extreme acquisitiveness, and a dynamic foreign policy having world dominion for its objective. If he continued to run true to form, and if he were able to conquer Great Britain in the next month, then he would probably strike for the country which could profit him most and afford him world outposts to support world trade and world dominion. When we look over Europe, we note that the countries that Hitler has conquered so far, the Netherlands, Belgium, Norway, and even France are among the most densely populated areas in the world. They have few raw materials, therefore, Hitler's chief aims are area and raw materials. He can get them more easily in South America than any other place in the world. It is the largest, the least populated, and the weakest continent. He could get even more raw materials in the United States. Whether he will strike directly at the United States we do not know; but we know that if he invaded the Western Hemisphere, he would require naval, submarine, and airplane bases on islands near us. This we could not tolerate.

Since Hitler has struck at both France and England before they were adequately prepared, it is prudent to conclude that he would strike at the Western Hemisphere before we were prepared. Hitler has shown that he knows time is of the essence. He has been willing to sacrifice a million men on the western front because he knew that if the war lasted too long, his own raw materials would not last. He also knows that the United States is in a preparedness race and that within 12 months we will be in a far stronger position to defend our civilization. Given immediate and efficient production and training of men, we would be, in a few years, invincible. Therefore I think that General Marshall and Secretary Stimson do not exaggerate when they warn the American public of the danger which faces us immediately. That, I may add, is one reason why I believe that time is so essential in the passage of the Selective Service Draft Act.

Question. Senator, do you believe that that bill will pass Congress soon?

Answer. Yes; possibly within 2 weeks; certainly within a month. And its passage in itself will be of tremendous importance. It will serve notice to the world that we are ready to defend what we have. Also, I think it will help to awaken the youth of this country to the act of all pulling together in emergency. I think it will make the young men from 21 to 31 realize that they have something to defend which is very precious and that we are among the few countries in the world where it still remains. It will be our answer to the world revolution. We love peace, but we will have liberty. It cannot be taken from us by seduction or by force.

Question. Suppose, Senator, that Germany is unsuccessful in her impending "blitzkrieg" and that Great Britain in the end wins the war.

Answer. From the point of view of national defense, no matter who wins the war, it is all-important that we be prepared. If Germany wins, we already know the consequences—some of which we have just discussed. If Great Britain wins, then all Europe will be prostrate. We will see the most desperate system of slave labor and cutthroat competition and barter deals that the world has witnessed perhaps in history. If Great Britain wins, our Government ought to be strong enough to protect the interests and welfare of its people. In the adjustment of world affairs the United States ought not to be dictated to by any victor. Furthermore, there will be a situation in which a strong Communist nation, which may have kept aloof from the war, can take advantage of the prostrate nations. I don't think that I am warmongering when I say this: Even an armed peace is preferable to war; but I firmly believe that what we do now gains security and peace for us now and qualifies us to promote in the future new sanctions for enduring peace for the world.

MANGANESE

Mr. BURKE obtained the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BURKE. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator. Mr. President, a telegram I have received from the Chamber of Commerce of Mohave County, Ariz., reads in part as follows:

The Washington broadcast program of American Defense Advisory Commission last evening through the showing of the Chairman on War Minerals stated that the United States was securing its war supply of manganese from Brazil, and in explaining a delay called attention that they had to build a railroad in Brazil to get to the manganese. * * *

MOHAVE COUNTY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By J. H. SMITH, President.
LEROY V. ROOT,
Chairman, Committee on Mines.

Mr. President, the signers of this telegram have performed a timely and patriotic service in furnishing this information.

For many years I have pointed out that there are abundant deposits of manganese in the United States. I shall not now trespass upon the time of the able Senator from Nebraska, who has yielded to me, to point out from what sources comes the opposition to developing the manganese mines of the United States except to say that manganese is used to sweeten pig iron. On November 7, 1929, in an extended debate in the Senate, I held the floor some hours, indicating not only the States in which the manganese mines are located but also the counties, the districts, and in some instances the names of the mines in the various States whence abundant supplies of manganese for war purposes and for industrial purposes may be secured.

The list of States is as follows: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Georgia, Idaho, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, and Wyoming.

Powerful interests have for years opposed the levying of a protective tariff on manganese, forsooth, because these interests preferred to secure manganese from Brazil or other foreign lands.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, the debate of November 7, 1929, wherein I disclosed that our own country has within her bosom abundant supplies of manganese. It is unnecessary to spend—if indeed it is being done or is contemplated—moneys of the United States in building railroads in Brazil to transport manganese.

May I secure permission to have printed at this point in the RECORD the matter to which I have referred?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ASHURST. If I have the floor, I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I know what the Senator and others have done with reference to trying to develop manganese production in this country. I have joined in that effort. I wish to say to the Senator that the Government recently—in the last week, I think—entered into a contract with some of the mining companies in Montana for the production of a large quantity of manganese, which will result in the employment of about three or four hundred men. They are building there a concentrating plant which will cost about a million and a half dollars. However, if this had been done at the time the Senator suggested, we should be in a much better position.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me again?

Mr. BURKE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. In the debate which I purpose to have printed in the RECORD it will be noted that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], as well as other Senators, took, I believe, a most statesmanlike attitude; and reading this debate now, in the light of history, it is interesting to observe that with an almost clear horoscope the future was foreseen.

I thank the Senator from Nebraska for yielding to me.

EXHIBIT A

November 7, 1929

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2667) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, to protect American labor, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. Oddie to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment of the committee was, on page 56, after line 21, to strike out the first subdivision of paragraph 302 in the following words:

"PAR. 302. (a) Manganese ore or concentrates containing in excess of 30 percent of metallic manganese, 1 cent per pound on the metallic manganese contained therein."

Mr. Oddie's amendment to the amendment is to insert in lieu of the language proposed to be stricken out by the committee:

"PAR. 302. (a) Manganese ore or concentrates of all kinds, containing less than 10 percent of metallic manganese, shall be admitted free of duty; containing 10 percent or more of metallic manganese and less than 20 percent, one-half of 1 cent per pound on the metallic manganese contained therein; containing 20 percent or more of metallic manganese and less than 25 percent, 1 cent per pound on the metallic manganese contained therein; containing 25 percent of metallic manganese, or more, 1½ cents per pound on the metallic manganese contained therein."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, inasmuch as during the course of my remarks I shall refer to certain maps now on the wall in rear of the Chamber, I ask permission of the Senate, and particularly of the Vice President, that I may stand at a point in front of this desk, thereby temporarily turning my back upon the Presiding Officer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, even if I possessed the capacity so to do, it would not be necessary so to enter into a general homily as to the philosophy, history, and the operation of the tariff in the United States. In that respect the general field has been covered ably in the debate by a number of Senators.

Opulent as history is in irony, I am unable to call to mind at the moment any irony more distinct than the efforts of my honorable friend the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Reed, to promote free trade on manganese.

With due deference to the talent and the genius of Alexander Hamilton, I assert that the State of Pennsylvania, and not Hamilton, was the father of the protective tariff system in the United States. The subject of revenue was a vexatious one during the colonial times. Until 1789 each State controlled the imposition of its various customs duties, and in colonial times each State that had a seaport applied its own tariff schedules and no two tariff schedules were alike.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. By what authority have Kresge and Woolworth moved into the Senate Chamber?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, my amiable friend the statesman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] just secured recognition to propound a parliamentary inquiry, and ask by what authority did Kresge and Woolworth move into the Senate Chamber. The cold CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which does not, of course, disclose a picture of the exhibits piled upon the tables in the rear of the Chamber, might lead some reader to believe that the Senator was referring to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to disclaim that implication. I had reference to the exhibit over in the corner of the Chamber.

Mr. ASHURST. Woolworth and Kresge are 5-and-10-cent people, and I do not desire any reader to gain any such impression as might be conveyed by the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky. [Laughter.]

The tariff bill of 1789 was the first bill discussed in our first House of Representatives. James Madison, of Virginia, who introduced the subject of the tariff, was then in the early maturity of a life of much usefulness, and his ability as a counselor and his skill in drafting laws and constitutions were everywhere recognized. He said in his speech of April 8, 1789:

"A national revenue must be obtained, but the system must be such that while it secures the object of revenue it shall not be oppressive to our constituents."

And he urged the collection of the national revenue without oppression upon the people.

The next day the discussion of the tariff bill became general, and Mr. Thomas FitzSimmons, of Pennsylvania, said that he extended his views further than the other speakers. Among other things, Mr. FitzSimmons said that the duties should be calculated "to encourage the protection of infant industries." Here, Mr. President, we encounter, at the very inception of our national history, Pennsylvania's demand for a tariff. From that good day down through the annals of our national history, like a golden thread, has run the demand of the State of Pennsylvania for a protective tariff, and this thread was never severed until my able and honorable friend the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Reed, demanded free trade on manganese. In the State of Pennsylvania vast quantities of steel are manufactured.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the able Senator from Arizona a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask if Pennsylvania has not always demanded free raw material?

Mr. ASHURST. As I have said, vast quantities of steel are manufactured in Pennsylvania. I need not at this time employ any words in telling the Senate that manganese is used generally in the production of steel; indeed, I doubt not that a score, possibly two score, of Senators know far more about the technique, as to how manganese is used in the manufacture of steel, than do I; but it is within the common knowledge of every Senator, and it is within the common knowledge of practically every ordinarily well-informed citizen, that manganese is used to harden steel products and to sweeten pig iron.

The representatives of the steel interests appeared last winter—and I make no complaint of that; they had a right to do so—before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives and asked the committee to free list manganese, which the committee refused to to. Thus the tariff bill which we are now considering, House bill 2667, as it passed the House carried a duty on manganese ore or concentrates containing in effect increasing the duty over and above the 1-cent-per-pound on the metallic manganese contained therein.

The Senate committee at first accepted the House rate on the metallic content of manganese ore, and the Senate committee even broadened it out to apply to ore of low content, thus in effect increasing the duty over and above the 1-cent-per-pound level.

Then subsequently, to wit, on the 13th of August, there came the announcement from Russia that the United States Steel Corporation had signed a 5-year contract with the Russian Soviet agreeing to purchase from 80,000 to 150,000 tons of Russian manganese annually. Reconsidering this item, the Senate committee on the 14th of August, after having taken the action I have just described, executed a volte-face, reversed itself, and voted 6 yeas and 5 nays to place manganese ore on the free list, with a saving, if such action shall be ratified by the Congress and approved by the President of between $2,000,000 and $4,000,000 annually in tariff duties to the United States Steel Corporation on its Russian contract alone.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to inquire if the Senator from Arizona knows why the members of the committee changed their opinion about it? I have been told that it was at the instance of the White House and that the President asked them to do it. I was curious to know why it was that the President had changed his mind with reference to the question, particularly in view of his speech in Colorado, in which he said he was in favor of a tariff on manganese.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator from Montana is mistaken.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator I do not think I am mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that the President never said a word to me about it, and I do not believe he said a word on the subject to a single member of the majority of the Finance Committee.

Mr. WHEELER. May I say to the Senator that he is entirely mistaken about that, unless I am misinformed by some members of the Finance Committee. I will inquire if the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Moses] is in the Chamber? I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he knows, or if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Bingham] knows why the change was made and if it was not made at the request of the White House?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield, but I do not wish to lose the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rules the Senator has only the right to yield for a question.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, I yield for a question only.

Mr. REED. I will have to put an interrogation point, then, after what I say.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is entitled to take some liberty with me.

Mr. REED. When I heard the statement about this so-called Soviet contract with the steel corporation, I made inquiry of the steel corporation as to whether there was any truth in the report. I was told that it was completely incorrect; that they had made no such contract at all, and that the report was erroneous.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My information is that it is the Bethlehem Steel Co. that has the contract, and not the United States Steel Corporation. I inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania if he can give us any information as to that?

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I say my information about the matter is that it is the Bethlehem Steel Co. that has the contract with the Soviet Government.

Mr. REED. I do not know. The newspapers said it was the United States Steel Corporation, so I made my inquiry of them. I never until this moment heard it suggested that it was the Bethlehem Co. That may be so for all I know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BRATTON. In view of the inquiry propounded by the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], I call the attention of the Senator from Arizona to the press dispatch appearing in the New York World of August 16 last, in which this is said:

"WASHINGTON, August 15.—Responsibility for the action of the Senate Finance Committee in placing manganese ore on the free list, thereby reversing the committee's previous action and granting a saving of $8,000,000 a year to the steel manufacturers, was laid on the White House doorstep today by Senator Hiram Bingham (Republican, Connecticut), a member of the committee.

"In a secret session of Republican Finance Committee members a few weeks ago Bingham voted for a duty of 1 cent a pound on ore containing 10 percent or more of metallic manganese. Yesterday he was one of the two members of the committee who reversed their previous votes and put manganese on the free list. When asked why he changed he said the White House advised it."

I do not vouch for that statement, but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it appeared in one of the most reputable newspapers in the United States, and this morning is the first time I have heard it disputed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. My friend from New Mexico [Mr. Bratton] was not present on the floor of the Senate some weeks ago when the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] referred to this report. I was present at the time, and I said, without mentioning the name of the newspaper at that time, that a newspaper had stated that I had given out a statement and had said that I had voted first for the duty on manganese; that I had later voted against it, and that I had changed my vote at the request of the White House. I said at that time that, except for the fact that I gave out no statement, that I had not voted for a duty on manganese, that I had not changed my vote, and that whatever had been done had not been done at the request of the White House, the story was correct.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield for a question.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator permit me to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. ASHURST. If I may yield for such purpose.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if it was not his understanding that this change was made at the request of the White House?

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is asking something which is in the nature of hearsay or of understanding; and I do not think the Senator's question is one that can well be answered at this time. I have stated very frankly that the article in the newspaper was entirely incorrect.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield further.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to direct my question to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Moses]. I see that he is in the Chamber at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Hampshire give his attention?

Mr. WHEELER. I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire if it was not his understanding that this rate on manganese was changed at the request of the White House?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I cannot say that I had any particular understanding about it. I am not a member of the Committee on Finance, and, as I recall, these rates were being made at a time when I was absent from the city. I remember that the city of Washington was full of rumors to that effect at the time.

Mr. WHEELER. I will state that a member of the Finance Committee, who does not happen to be present, stated to me that the rate was changed because of that fact.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to accept, and do accept, the statement of a Senator; if he changed his vote at the behest of the White House, he probably should not be too severely condemned; and I shall not discuss the reasons why any member of the committee changed his vote. It was a singular circumstance, however, that the Finance Committee should first at one sitting broaden out and thus practically in effect increase the duty on manganese, and then, as soon as the Russian contract with the United States Steel Corporation was made, the committee should execute this volte-face and thus change its position.

But even if those members of the committee who did change their vote did say that they took such action at the request of the White House, such statement would be of little probative value, because Mr. Hoover during his candidacy for the Presidency of the United States, speaking for a duty on manganese, said in his speech delivered in Pueblo, Colo., on November 3, 1928, which speech was widely quoted—I have a photostat copy of the page of the newspaper carrying the speech and have had it verified, as follows:

"I know of no State in the Union where continuation of the Republican Party in power is of more vital importance than to the people of Colorado. There is hardly a product of your whole State that is not dependent upon tariff for its very existence. Of your minerals, zinc, tungsten, and manganese could scarcely be produced except for the protective tariff."

Is that the speech to which the able Senator from Montana refers?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes, Mr. President; that is the matter to which I had reference.

Mr. ASHURST. The United States Steel Corporation was formed under the direction of Mr. Elbert H. Gary, now deceased; and it was formed at a time when the steel industry was about to enter upon an era of its greatest expansion. That corporation became the most colossal single producer in that industry. Indeed, it is the giant of that industry and has 136 distribution agencies in 44 countries. Mr. President, it has been said that the United States Steel Corporation is indifferent as to a tariff; but my opinion is that if it is not demanding a protective tariff it occupies the position of Addison's valetudinarian, who whilst loudly complaining that he was starving to death grew so fat that he was shamed into silence.

Mr. President, I am now going to advert to another phase of this question, but before I do so I desire to take the judgment of the Senate as to the propriety of reading from the statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and at this juncture I particularly ask the attention of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot].

I do not wish to violate the proprieties or any confidence of the Senate. I desire to refer to some figures in the statement by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in response to Senate Resolution 108 relative to furnishing the Committee on Finance with statements of profits and losses of certain taxpayers. I desire to know if I am at liberty to read extracts from that publication?

Mr. SMOOT. That rests entirely with the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not want to violate any propriety or any confidence of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that personally I would not do it; but, if I wanted to, I would refer to the report as to whether the taxpayer's business was profitable or whether it was not profitable. That I do not think there is any impropriety in doing.

Mr. ASHURST. In the Senate, above any other place, or, rather, as well as in any other place, the amenities that guide and guard gentlemen should be observed. I think we all agree on that; and I expect to refer to and to read some extracts from these reports of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that have been sent to us, but if Senators feel that I would thereby be violating the proprieties or the amenities, I would not do so. I ask the judgment of the Senate on this point.

Mr. SMOOT. I can only say, Mr. President, that I would not do it; but if I wanted to refer to any company whose report has been sent to the Finance Committee and to the Senate I would do it in a general way by saying that its operations were very profitable, or they were profitable, or they were not profitable.

Mr. ASHURST. Would the Senator deem that any reference to losses would be a violation?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think that would be a violation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I trust the Senator from Arizona will not be restrained by any consideration of amenities or what might be regarded as gentlemanly conduct. If he is not restrained by the law from discussing these reports, and he does not feel that the law restrains him, I know of no consideration of propriety or appropriateness in debate that ought to restrain him in the slightest degree.

Mr. ASHURST. I am glad to have that light thrown upon the matter.

Mr. Smoot and Mr. Phipps addressed the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield first to the Senator from Utah. Then I will yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I fully agree with the Senator from Montana; but, in my opinion, it would be a violation of law to do so. I do not mean that it would be a violation of law to state whether the taxpayer's operations were profitable or whether they were unprofitable, or whether there was a loss or whether there was a gain; but I do believe that the law prevents the publication of this matter here, where it would be published in the RECORD and open to the world.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Fess in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PHIPPS. May I say that having looked at some of the reports that have come to us from the Tariff Commission, I note that in some instances concerns have been losing money year after year in certain lines of business. As far as the Steel Corporation is concerned, of course it is a leader in the steel business, and it is an outstanding mark. Everyone refers to it. It publishes all of its information. It conceals nothing. Nothing that the Senator might refer to in its report would be objected to; but I beg the Senator not to call attention to concerns that have been losing money, particularly at this moment, when a reference to their condition might have a disastrous effect on their business.

Mr. ASHURST. I shall adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado and not refer to the losses of any company by name.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is discussing a very interesting question, and one which has been the subject of some controversy heretofore in the Senate.

The Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh, is absolutely correct. Nothing in the way of courtesy or the amenities—to use the term of the Senator from Montana—ought to restrain the Senator from Arizona in the use of the information to which he refers. It is purely a question of how far he is permitted to use this information under the law.

The Federal law is that the returns of the taxpayer are secret, and not to be divulged by the Treasury Department to anyone except by authority of law. The law provides, however, that either the Finance Committee or the Ways and Means Committee may ask for these returns for their use, and that they may report these returns to the Congress. I do not think they have reported these urns to the Congress, but they have furnished them to the Members of the Senate and probably to the Members of the House.

With reference to the use of those returns, the Senator from Utah, I think, volunteered the opinion a few minutes ago that a Senator might refer to the losses.

Mr. SMOOT. A loss, but not the amount of the loss; or a gain, but not the amount of the gain.

Mr. SIMMONS. A Senator might refer to a profit but not to the amount of the profit.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. If that is the only use that the Senate committee or the Members of the Senate can make of this information after they get it, then it is absolutely useless information, and there is no practical object or purpose in the law which authorizes them to ask for these returns and to report them to the Congress.

I think that when those returns are placed in the hands of a Senator for his use it is a matter of discretion with him as to how he will use this information for the purpose of aiding him in the study or in the exposition of questions relating to the tariff; and, so far as I am concerned, if I felt that it was proper to use the exact returns of any concern in order to enlighten the Senate or the Members of the Senate with reference to the tariff rate under discussion, I should not have the slightest hesitation in doing it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. So that the Senator will know just what the law is in this respect, I want to read it:

"Any relevant or useful information thus obtained may be submitted by the committee obtaining it to the Senate or the House, or to both the Senate and House, as the case may be."

There is no need of my reading the rest of it.

Mr. ASHURST. It is not at all to my taste to exploit, here or elsewhere, figures as to what somebody has made or lost, but I did think I had a right—indeed, that it was my duty—to point out that the steel interests, which have opposed a duty on manganese, have no grounds to complain that their industries were languishing, and that, therefore, they could not stand any duty upon their raw materials. I thought to reinforce my argument by showing that in many, if not in practically all, instances these steel industries were opulent and have enjoyed extremely large profits.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Even if the Senator were not disposed to go as far as I said that I felt he was justified in going, certainly he could read, without mentioning the names, that certain steel companies showed a profit. If the Senator will pardon me further, I cannot understand why those who are demanding high duties for certain industries in this country are so bent upon preventing the use of these returns of the income taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not that at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think it would be quite appropriate at this place to have incorporated in the RECORD the law. In my judgment there is no reason at all under the law why the Senator should not make such use of these reports as he cares to make. Section 1024 of title 26 of the Code of Laws reads as follows:

"1024. Inspection; lists of persons making returns; amount paid: (a) Returns upon which the tax has been determined by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall constitute public records; but they shall be open to inspection only upon order of the President and under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and approved by the President: Provided, That the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Finance of the Senate, or a special committee of the Senate or House shall have the right to call on the Secretary of the Treasury for, and it shall be his duty to furnish, any data of any character contained in or shown by the returns or any of them, that may be required by the committee; and any such committee shall have the right, acting directly as a committee, or by and through such examiners or agents as it may designate or appoint, to inspect all or any of the returns at such times and in such manner as it may determine; and any relevant or useful information thus obtained may be submitted by the committee obtaining it to the Senate or the House, or to both the Senate and House, as the case may be."

The Finance Committee has called upon the Secretary of the Treasury for this information, and the information has been put into the hands of every Member of the Senate, so that the matter has been submitted to the Senate; and, of course, if it is submitted to the Senate, it can be submitted only for such use as Senators may care to make of it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to say that the position taken by the Senator from Montana is precisely the position taken by me in the Finance Committee meeting at the time when it was decided by the committee to submit to the Senate this information which is now published. Certainly, submitting this information to the Senate means the submission to the Senate in open session. It becomes a matter of public record, since we have no secret sessions of the Senate unless by an express vote, and then only on executive matters, like the confirmation of persons nominated to office.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have tried fairly to take the sentiment and judgment of the Senate upon this question, and with due deference to those who may criticize my use of the figures—and I shall be conservative in using them—I believe, as a humble member of the bar of my State, that any Senator is justified in following the legal opinions of such eminent lawyers as the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] and the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. In fact, lawyers, when talking with them, may be likened to Saul sitting at the feet of Gamaliel. I speak now of that period from the date of the signing of the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill until the end of the year 1928. The entire losses of the steel interests, upon which reports were asked by the committee, for the years 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927, and 1928 amount to $1,503,259.34.

Mr. SMOOT. As the companies reported.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; as the companies reported. Now, as to the profits. I take first the Otis Steel Co. The yearly profits, by years, according to their books, were:

1922	$496,207
1923	1,358,231
1925	1,162,612
1927	1,359,904
1928	3,746,811

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, what the Senator is reading, I take it, is the net gain after all of the depreciations, which in some instances were tremendous.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; the net gain, according to the books of the various companies, after paying all replacements, taxes, betterments, salaries, and so forth—the net gain, according to their books.

The yearly profits of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, according to their books, were:

1922	$4,607,254
1923	12,710,712
1924	8,922,446
1925	13,866,753
1926	20,246,166
1927	15,529,917
1928	15,980,835

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Has the Senator computed the percentage of profits of the outstanding stock for any year?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not.

The profits by years, according to the books of the Gulf State Co., of Birmingham, Ala., were as follows:

1922	$958,207
1923	1,576,521
1924	912,873
1925	1,036,777
1926	779,792
1927	756,403
1928	924,745

The profits by years of the Inland Steel Co., according to their books, were as follows:

1922	$1,150,008
1923	5,600,168
1924	6,190,600
1925	5,538,734
1926	8,039,704
1927	7,800,894
1928	10,394,297

The profits of the Republic Iron & Steel Co., Youngstown, Ohio, according to their books, were as follows:

1922	Not given.
1923	$6,644,343
1924	2,068,297
1925	3,813,484
1926	3,623,774
1927	3,018,282
1928	4,642,450

The profits of the Wheeling Steel Corporation, Wheeling, W. Va., according to their books, were as follows:

1922	$1,725,260
1923	5,448,169
1924	865,110
1925	4,073,295
1926	5,660,184

The profits of the American Rolling Mills Co., Middletown, Ohio, according to their books, were as follows:

1922	$2,605,766
1923	3,518,223
1924	2,662,631
1925	2,755,093
1926	4,015,999
1927	3,452,549
1928	14,062,978

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. SACKETT. Has the Senator any data to show whether the companies are the same size or whether they have purchased other plants?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not.

Mr. SACKETT. The Senator surely does not want to intimate that if they have purchased other plants they are simply growing in profits? It may be due to mergers or various other matters of that kind, and simply to read the profits would give a wrong impression.

Mr. ASHURST. I am stating net profits according to the books of the various companies.

Mr. SACKETT. That is perfectly true. Those are the net profits according to their own books; but naturally the net profits would depend upon the size of the units which were operating in particular years. It may be if they had added units to the organization the totals would show more, although the profits were less.

Mr. ASHURST. The last one I shall read is United States Steel. Their profits, according to their books, were as follows: For the year 1922, $39,653,455; for 1923, $108,707,064; for 1924, $85,110,940; for 1925, $90,602,652; for 1926, $116,667,404; for 1927, $87,896,836; for 1928, $114,173,774; a total of profits, according to their own books, since the signing of the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill, of $642,812,128.

To recapitulate, the total profits, according to the books of the companies reported upon, aggregate $877,684,318.89, but deducting losses during this period, aggregating $1,503,259.34, leaves a grand total of profits in the steel industry since the signing of the Fordney-McCumber bill until the end of 1928 of $876,181,059.55.

The reliability of these figures becomes apparent in the light of the fact that they are submitted by the different corporations as a basis on which to compute their income taxes. Obviously the net income would not be reported as less than the figures given. Incidentally, it is interesting to note that these enormous profits have been earned by the steel companies during a period of hopeless depression on the part of mines and agriculture.

The able Senator from Nevada [Mr. Oddie], in the course of his address yesterday, pointed out—and I shall not traverse the ground over which he passed—the need for the tariff which would be afforded if his amendment should be adopted.

When he concluded his address the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] read a letter from a gentleman who went on to say that manganese is a very necessary item in our national defense and that therefore we ought not to put a tariff thereon. The point the Senator from Washington made is to my mind conclusive, to wit: That if manganese be, as it is, a metal necessary in the manufacture of ordnance and other munitions, for a stronger reason, a fortiori, we ought to build up the industry at home. Senators will remember in the dark days of March and April 1918 that our miners and prospectors in response to the call of their Government went out upon the hills, smote the obdurate face of nature to compel her to bring forth her treasures, not of gold, not of silver, but of manganese, that we thereby stimulated the production of manganese but at that same time we were bringing from overseas half of our manganese. Who does not recall the unfortunate and mysterious disappearance of the steamship Cyclops which was last heard of some time during the month of March 1918, somewhere in the West Indies; she was bound for an Atlantic port in the United States from Barbados, laden with manganese ore; she had a complement of 211 men, 15 officers, and 57 passengers. Nothing was ever heard of her further, and men and cargo were all lost. She sank without a trace. Not a spar has ever come to the surface to indicate her fate. We remember that poignancy of the grief that fell upon us because upon the Cyclops at the time she sank was a close relative of a United States Senator who was serving then with us. What was the mission of that ship? With what was she laden? She was bringing manganese to the United States to assist in the manufacture of our own ordnance and other munitions of war.

Passing from a discussion as to the use of manganese in the manufacture of munitions. I repeat that I need not here tell anyone how widely is manganese now used in the manufacture of steel products. The opponents of a duty on manganese have inveterately said that "It is hopeless, it is useless, to attempt even by a tariff to stimulate the production of manganese in the United States." "Let us surrender," they say. "We cannot ever hope to be in a position where the United States can produce enough manganese to meet our own demands, but we must have free trade on this ore, because," as they assert, "American genius and American capital cannot produce enough manganese to take care of our own needs."

Let us examine that contention. On the wall is a map. That map is not made by someone connected with the manganese industry. It is made by the Geological Survey. I ask Senators to examine the map and they will see a large number of black pins—216 in number.

Each black pin represents a manganese deposit. Passing along we reach and pass through Arkansas and Oklahoma and reach the State of New Mexico, so ably represented here by her two Senators. There manganese deposits exist. Crossing my own State of Arizona we still see black pegs, and in and around the area where the tip of Nevada touches Arizona, at about the position of the proposed Boulder Dam, are enormous deposits of manganese. Passing on into the State of California, a State so well represented in this body, I call attention to the black pegs on the map showing manganese deposits. I cannot refer to each State, but I ask Senators to look at the map and see how many there are. There are more than 216 black pegs representing manganese deposits, and I cannot take time to mention them all.

I have here in my hand another map made by the Government, not a map privately made by myself or someone else but made by the United States Government in 1918. I digress to ask why was this map withheld from the public all these years? Why was it not promulgated? This map bears the stamp "First proof," I presume, of the Geological Survey, "February 20, 1920," but so far as I am advised it has just come to light. It discloses that the Government officials themselves not lately indicated, but years ago, many of the same places and same deposits indicated by the black pins on the large map to which I have just called attention.

In order that Senators may know where these deposits are and how vast they are I shall read a few of them, but I cannot read them all. I ask permission at this juncture to include in the RECORD not the map but the legend or list containing the names of the States, the names of the counties, and the names of the mines or districts where manganese deposits are found.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator read the counties in North Carolina where manganese is found?

Mr. ASHURST. I thank my able friend from North Carolina for his interruption. In Ashe County, the Jefferson district; in Cherokee County, the Shooting Creek district; in Cleveland County, the Kings Mountain manganese properties—and what a host of precious memories are conjured up by the very name "Kings Mountain"; Hot Springs district, in Madison County; in Surry County, the Mount Airy claims; and in Transylvania County, the Brevard properties; and so on. About these deposits the argument is to the effect, "Oh, yes; but the ores are of low grade."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator passes that particular matter, I desire to advise the Senate that in 1927 the Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines published a bulletin entitled "Manganese and Manganiferous Ores," in which are listed 17 States in which not only are there deposits of manganiferous ores but in which the deposits are actually worked and shipments made, and in the case of each State the productive mines are listed.

Mr. ASHURST. A vast deal of misinformation and erroneous propaganda have been sent forth alleging that there is very little low-grade manganese ore in the United States and that there is even a still smaller quantity of high-grade manganese ore in the United States; thus the impression has been created in some quarters that our steel manufacturers would dwindle and would probably disappear if the steel interests depended upon the United States for their manganese, but the very reverse is true, to wit, there is an abundance of manganese ore, both of the high grade and the low grade, in the United States.

Within the past few years chemistry and metallurgical methods for beneficiating these manganese ores have made enormous progress. Indeed, these discoveries and advances in chemistry, geophysics, metallurgy, and chemical engineering within the past 7 or 8 years are so dazzling that they almost rival the old dream of the Alembic; and when we invoice and catalog the recent great discoveries in science we feel that Aladdin's Lamp and the Purse of Fortunatus in comparison are tame and prosaic. To this generation has been given the keys to the kingdom of the material world.

No well-informed man would attempt to delimit the boundaries of chemical science or deny that the quiet laboratory may signify more agencies for national defense and more potentialities for the victories of peace than a whole regiment, and that sometimes a timid and bespectacled chemist is as important in bringing about victory in war or in advancing peaceful pursuits and mobilizing the resources of civilization as are bankers, parliamentarians, and Government executives. Just so, within the past decade, scientific chemistry now beneficiates manganese ores, and these manganese ore deposits of our own country are ample to supply the needs and requirements of our industries.

Therefore when we are told in the lugubrious jeremiads of the steel manufacturers that there is not a sufficient quantity of manganese in the United States for our industries, we reply to such a plea of pessimism and defeatism that the prospector and miner, that science and chemistry, refute such doleful assertions. Science is the fifth estate, and her wizardries may with confidence be depended upon to beneficiate our manganese ores.

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I shall briefly conclude the remarks on the pending bill which I commenced yesterday. One reason for being brief is that I understand certain opponents of the measure are to speak, and I am sure we all wait with great interest to see what possible objections can be urged to this wholly meritorious measure.

Yesterday I attempted to show the origin of the bill. I did that because in the press and on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere it has been charged that it is a hastily thrown together measure, poorly drafted, and not having back of it the solid thought and consideration which so weighty a measure should always have. I pointed out to the Senate yesterday that, going back a number of years, under the authority of the National Defense Act of 1920, the Army and the Navy chiefs have united in setting up a joint Army and Navy Commission or Board to study the question of manpower in our armed forces; that beginning at least in 1926 that Commission set itself to the task of studying selective compulsory service in this country and throughout the world, and applied itself to the task of trying to put into form to submit to Congress the ideas of our Military Establishment upon the question of selective service in a democracy as the proper method of maintaining the proper armed strength and the appropriate number and quality of Reserves. I stated that that Commission, which is still in existence, had continued its work through the years, studying, as I say, the selective-service systems that were used in the South and in the North during the Civil War, the compulsory-service systems—if we must call them that—used by England and the other countries across the water during the World War, and our own selective-service system, and that as a result of all those ideas the Commission had finally worked out a measure which was submitted to the Military Affairs Committee. Many of the ideas contained in that measure are embodied in the pending bill; in fact, it formed the foundation of the measure now before the Senate, coming from the very best minds in the country so far as military policy is concerned.

I also pointed out that, along with this matter, there had been worked into shape a proposal for a selective-service measure by the Military Training Camps Association, and because that association has suffered some aspersions on the floor of the Senate I took occasion to point out just what that organization is. I shall not review the matter now, since it is fully set out in the RECORD, which is on the desk of each Senator, other than to say that this organization goes back to the period of the Plattsburg camps prior to the World War; that the head of the Military Training Camps Association serves as the chief civilian aide to the Secretary of War; that there is a governing board consisting of the chief civilian aides in each of the nine corps areas; and that it is an organization extending into every State and into almost every county in the country, composed not of warmongers, not of men who believe in war as an instrument of national policy, but of men who thoroughly believe that in a democracy there is a duty resting upon every citizen to be trained and ready to render whatever service he may be called upon to render.

I went on from that point and attempted to answer the charge, so frequently made, that compulsory military service is un-American and undemocratic. Going back to George Washington and following the matter down through the years, I suggested that it would be very hard for anyone successfully to maintain the proposition that there is anything at all undemocratic or un-American in a proposal which recognizes that every citizen in a free government owes a proper proportion, not only of his property but also of his personal service, in order to maintain and defend the free institutions which he has the benefit of enjoying.

I should like to go on briefly from that point, Mr. President, and say that it seems to me the debate in the Senate has already reached such a point that but a single issue is involved. The chief opponents of the measure are already on record as saying that they have no objection to compulsory military service in time of war. Very well. If that be so, it is an important admission. But an even more significant statement and admission is made when, almost without exception, the same opponents of the pending measure say that, even in time of peace, in the matter of training men for war, if the volunteer system should break down, if it should not bring an adequate number of men into the service, or should not bring them in time, they would favor the compulsory selective system in time of peace. So, it seems to me, the single major issue in reference to the measure now pending before the Senate is, Can we safely rely upon a continuation of the volunteer system in order to bring into training the requisite number?

I think the distinction attempted to be drawn between compulsory military service in time of war and compulsory training for such service in time of peace is wholly without foundation. Once it is admitted that the Nation has the right to compel the citizen to bear arms in its defense—and, as I have said, probably not a single Member of the Senate disputes that right—the whole case is conceded, for it cannot be that a just and humane people would permit itself to be so restricted that it must send untrained soldiers into battle for the national defense. To conscript them, if you will, take them out of private life, and send them forth to do battle for their country untrained to me is unthinkable.

I quote again the sentence I quoted yesterday from the Progressive platform of 1916:

> Service without training means slaughter and disaster.

Every officer who has seen active service bears witness to the fact that it is positively criminal to expose men to danger unless they are well trained and know how to take care of themselves. Colonel Donovan, World War hero, states over and over again his belief that no one who believes that the men who may be called upon to fight in defense of their country should be given a reasonable opportunity to survive, could possibly oppose this measure for compulsory training in time of peace.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I gladly yield.

Mr. WHEELER. That is the same Colonel Donovan whom Colonel Knox sent to Europe, is it not?

Mr. BURKE. It is the same Colonel Donovan who very recently went to Europe and returned, either at the direction of Colonel Knox or the President of the United States, I do not know which.

Mr. WHEELER. And it is the same Colonel Donovan who was in Harry Daugherty's office as Assistant Attorney General, is it not?

Mr. BURKE. I believe Colonel Donovan served very ably as an assistant to the Attorney General during the Coolidge administration.

Mr. WHEELER. And it is the same Colonel Donovan who was part and parcel of the frame-up of the case, and sent agents to Montana "to get something on me." That is the same man.

Mr. BURKE. My acquaintance with Colonel Donovan comes in much more modern times than what I consider the very infamous proceeding, as I read about it many years ago, against the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. My acquaintance came at a time when he was in Daugherty's office, and when they sent Blair Coan out "to get something on" Senator Walsh and to try "to get something on me."

Mr. BURKE. On that point, if I recall correctly, at that time the present Justice of the Supreme Court, Harlan Stone, was or became Attorney General of the United States, and I found great difficulty at the time, having a very high regard then and now for Harlan Stone, to reconcile myself to the fact that he was head of the Justice Department when these proceedings, which seemed to me to be nefarious, were being prosecuted against the Senator from Montana. As I have said, I had not realized that it was during the time that Colonel Donovan was with the Department that those proceedings originated, but I should certainly want to investigate the matter very carefully for myself to determine whether I should not put Colonel Donovan in the same position with Justice Stone in reference to those matters, because every instinct I have tells me that this man, whom I have come to know well recently, and with whose war record I am very familiar, has nothing in his nature which would permit him willingly to do an injustice to the Senator from Montana or anyone else.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that, regardless of what he may think about Colonel Donovan, all he has to do is to read the record, and if he reads the record, either one of two things is demonstrated: Either Colonel Donovan was misled by the people who were in the office—and I cannot conceive how any lawyer of any ability whatsoever could be misled by the kind of stories that were told to him—one must come to the conclusion either that he was not a good lawyer, and did not know anything about the prosecution of cases, or that he was part and parcel of the frame-up.

Mr. BURKE. Was Justice Stone misled in the same way?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes, indeed; let me say to the Senator. As a matter of fact, one of the reasons why Colonel Donovan was not appointed Attorney General of the United States was the protests which went in from Senator Borah and other members of the United States Senate. They felt that he could not be confirmed as Attorney General, and I am told by very reliable authority, by a former distinguished Member of the Senate, that Justice Stone made the statement to him that they had lied to him.

Mr. BURKE. If Justice Stone was misled, I can understand that Colonel Donovan might also have been misled.

Mr. WHEELER. But, mind you, Colonel Donovan was in Daugherty's office at the time the prosecution was started, and he was one of the men who were handling it. Stone came in after Daugherty was forced out of the Department of Justice, after he was forced out because of his activities. Subsequently Mr. Daugherty was prosecuted, and subsequently a petit jury came within one vote of convicting him of matters which were shown up by the committee.

Mr. BURKE. In spite of all the Senator from Montana now states, I have complete confidence in the moral integrity and the intellectual honesty of Colonel Donovan. But I call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that he has not said anything bearing upon the question of Colonel Donovan's knowledge of military policy, his distinguished record in the World War, the fact that he stands today as the most experienced civilian soldier in the entire country, and has observed military affairs everywhere. Certainly, in spite of the strong feeling the Senator from Montana has on this subject, which is understandable, he would not question the strength of Colonel Donovan as a witness in the matter of a measure of the kind we are now considering.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Because Justice Stone's name has been connected with that of Mr. Donovan in the debate, I wish to call attention to the fact that Donovan was with the case referred to from the beginning, and Harlan Stone did not come in as Attorney General until toward the end of that very sordid story. Because he permitted the second trial of Senator WHEELER to continue, I voted against the confirmation of Harlan Stone.

Mr. BURKE. And it disturbed me very greatly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I did not think he should have done so. But I have come to the conclusion since, and I have been satisfied in my own mind, that the conspiracy had gone so far that if Harlan Stone, coming into the case at a late hour, had not let it go to its ultimate conclusion and go to the jury, his integrity might have been questioned. I came to the conclusion quite a long time ago that I made a mistake when I voted against the confirmation of Harlan Stone; but I did it under a misapprehension, thinking that he knew the facts of the conspiracy, and I have come to the conclusion that he did not know them. He merely took the word of those who had been working under Daugherty, and had prepared the case, and permitted the case to go to trial.

I am very glad to have the opportunity to make this explanation as to why I have changed my mind about the vote I cast on the confirmation of Harlan Stone. I think he is a very fine Justice of the Supreme Court.

Mr. BURKE. I thank the Senator from Minnesota, and wish to say that my feeling in the whole matter has been exactly like his as he has stated it to be, that if I had been a Member of the Senate at that time, I feel very sure I would have voted against the confirmation, and I am equally certain that, as matters have developed, and I have come to understand the situation more fully, I would join with the Senator from Minnesota in saying that had I done so I would have made a mistake.

But we are getting a little far afield from the question at issue. I had presented Colonel Donovan's name only in this connection, that as the leader of the Fighting Sixty-ninth, probably his name is familiar to more people in this country than that of almost any of the other soldiers who served in France. He has often told me that the most shocking experience he had on the other side, what grieved him most, was the fact that day after day he found that he was in command of troops some of whom were not adequately trained, and he determined then that, so far as it lay within his power, hoping all the time that his country would never have occasion to send any of its sons into battle again, he would devote all the energies at his command to seeing that the citizens of this country were adequately trained, so that he might never again have to live through the experiences he had undergone on the other side.

I have cited Colonel Donovan's opinion as bearing out the declaration in the Progressive platform of 1916, that "Service without training means slaughter and disaster," and that those who honestly but mistakenly place themselves in the way of and in opposition to giving adequate military training, must realize that they are assuming a considerable measure of responsibility if unfortunately sometime we should find ourselves in need of trained troops, and the voluntary system and no other system had given the adequate training.

Mr. President, I wish to say, with reference to the interruption concerning Colonel Donovan, that anyone who has tried hard-fought law suits realizes that frequently quite extraneous matters with reference to a witness are brought in to attack the credibility of the witness, although the attorney examining the witness, the judge, and the jury, and everyone else may be satisfied that the witness is telling the complete and full truth on the particular point under investigation. So, I recognize the right of saying something about any of the witnesses that I present.

I referred to George Washington yesterday as saying that the conscription system is democratic and American. I have read some debunking histories which make George Washington out to be a bad man in some respects, but I am glad that no one in the Senate took occasion to attack him as a witness.

I mention next General Pershing. I have no doubt there are some doughboys and under officers and others who have pretty strong feeling against General Pershing, but I do not expect them to use it as an argument against General Pershing when he states, as he did to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs a few weeks ago:

> First of all, let me say that if we had adopted compulsory military training in 1914 it would not have been necessary for us to send partially trained boys into battle against the veteran troops of our adversary, and certainly we could have ended the conflict much sooner, with the saving of many thousands of lives and billions of treasure.

That is the testimony of General Pershing.

The citizens of this country in large part realize the truth of the contention I am now making. They do not want to wait until war comes, if unhappily it should ever come, before we start the training of our citizens. Let no one here deceive himself into believing that his would be a happy lot if by his action he had helped to prevent or unduly postpone adequate military training for those who some day may be called upon to defend their country.

At this point I should like to read a short letter I received a day or two ago from a New York mother. She says:

> I would like this to be an open letter to those Senators who oppose military training for young men. I am a widow and the mother of a young man. I have been both mother and father to my son since early childhood, which makes him doubly dear to me. I have always believed that every young man should know how to box sufficiently to defend himself, how to swim, and how to shoot. * * *
> I would like to remind these Senators who oppose military training that we have our children taught swimming to keep them from drowning and we do not wait until an emergency brings them face to face with a watery grave.
>
> My son is all in the world I have, and to see him an unskilled fighter going forth to face a seasoned enemy soldier would terrify me doubly, not only the warfare but the fact that he might not be as alert and skilled as his opponent. I do not say these things in a spirit of aggression but with the knowledge that strength and confidence comes when you are absolutely unafraid of your opponent because you are ready for his every move. Can any Senator truthfully say if war comes (and God forbid) he would not breathe easier to know that any young man near to him was equipped in a way to give him a fighting chance?
> In these times a lot of fatuous talk will not insure protection from small souls drunk with desire for power. The gentle and kindly man never becomes cold-blooded through training; it teaches him, though, to recognize and handle a cold-blooded and murderous enemy. I believe all men should be trained to defend themselves in case they are called to defend the Nation. I hope and pray our men may not have to fight, but if they should be called upon in a mad world they can go forth in confidence bred of knowledge that they can match the enemy.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield gladly.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator feel that the induction into the Army of a man 25 years old is in any way similar to military training for boys in colleges and high schools?

Mr. BURKE. I shall have to say that I did not catch the first part of the Senator's question.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator feel that the compulsory training which the lady who wrote that letter is advocating for her boy and all boys in college is in any way similar to the proposal to take men from 21 years of age to 31 years of age, many of whom have already become established in their occupations, and to draft them for training into the Army of the United States?

Mr. BURKE. If I were to admit that I would draft them into the Army and not for training I would see some merit in the Senator's question. But that is not what the bill provides. It provides that the men who are selected shall be taken for a year's training. I think that is exactly the same situation this estimable lady had in mind in saying that if the young men had been denied the benefit of adequate military training in college or elsewhere, a sufficient number of them should now be given the benefit of it to constitute those who might be called into service if the time should ever come when their services were needed.

Mr. TAFT. But, as a matter of fact, the plan of the Army is to call men and to put them right into the Army, not for special training, but into the Army and into the National Guard for a year.

Mr. BURKE. For training purposes.

Mr. TAFT. To keep them there for a year, and then if there are not enough men—the Army officers said we must have 1,300,000 at least—Congress may under the proposed law require them to continue to serve for another year, and they would have to do so, because they would be the only men whom we could train to make up the army of 1,300,000 men. So is it not obvious that this is in fact a draft into the Army of the United States not of boys not for the training of boys, but of grown men, who are already engaged in their life occupations? Is that not the main purpose of the bill? Is that not the only emergency that really exists today?

Mr. BURKE. No; I do not think so. I disagree with the Senator from Ohio entirely on that point. This is a bill to provide training now that we are in a time of peace, for possible service in time of war. If war never comes, as we hope it never will, still this training will not have been wasted.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that, as I read the testimony—and I shall call attention to it later on in my own time—of either General Shedd or General Marshall, it was said that what the Army wanted was men. When the witness was asked whether the Army could not get them under voluntary enlistment he said "Yes," but the Army could not get them quickly enough, and so it wanted this conscription bill because it said it could not get them in the Army quickly enough under the volunteer enlistment method.

Mr. BURKE. I listened to General Shedd.

Mr. WHEELER. When I speak I shall quote his exact testimony.

Mr. BURKE. Very well. I listened to General Shedd and to all the other witnesses, and I think I am in a position to state what the position of the Army is in the matter, regardless of any excerpts which may be taken from the testimony of any witnesses. What they said in reference to taking these men into the Regular Army and into the National Guard was that that is the only sensible and proper way to train recruits. That if 400,000 men are selected on the first of October, the only way properly and promptly to train them is to fill up the skeleton National Guard regiments and the Regular Army. They will then be with older men who have had the training, and will secure their training promptly. Then after we have passed beyond that point, with this first selection we will have a sufficient number of trained officers, so that eventually, if the program continues, new units may be set up. But the matter of taking them into the Army now is only to provide a proper way by which they can promptly be trained.

Before I close I should like to read a part of a statement in a letter which I received a few days ago from a gentleman in Montana. I read it with particular pleasure.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator wishes to read letters from people in Montana I shall be glad to send over to my office and get letters from Montana, because I will say to the Senator that the letters I have received from Montana run over 40 to 1 against conscription.

Mr. BURKE. I realize that, and it was for that reason that I wanted to read a letter from a sensible Montana citizen. [Laughter.] The writer of this letter at 22 years of age was in the first draft in September 1917. He writes as follows:

April 1917 United States declared war on Germany. A blaze of black headlines captioned every newspaper in the land. At first it failed to arouse much interest. It seemed just another event in the world of news. The United States was terribly unprepared for war. At first officers had to be trained. That took many months. In September of the same year the "draft" got under way, and the able-bodied were drafted into the service. I was in the first call. For the first time in my life I felt a comforting satisfaction from the fact that I had had 2 years of compulsory military training in college.

Upon arriving in Camp Lewis we were assigned first to the depot brigade. It was in this brigade that we were to receive our elemental training. For 3 months we were put through the paces of training and discipline. Then our company, 250 strong, was called for transfer into active service abroad. Just before boarding the troop train a rush order came from headquarters requesting the company commander, clerk, supply sergeant, mess sergeant, and first-line sergeant (myself) to return to our barracks to train another hundred raw recruits who had just arrived in camp. It was not our privilege to object to this order, although we were disappointed that we could not go on with our men.

We were only with these hundred new recruits about a week when, again, another order came from headquarters ordering these new, green men to prepare for transfer—overseas and into the fight. When I read this order to these men it struck them like a thunderbolt. For a moment they stood motionless and speechless. They were stunned. They had not realized that we were at war. Now they knew it. Their faces were pale with fear—the fear of the helpless, the unprepared, the untrained. "Why, Sarge," they uttered, "they can't do this to us when we have had so little training. We are not soldiers yet. We can't shoot. We know nothing of taking cover for our own protection. They may just as well take us out and line us up before a firing squad. It is downright murder."

The verbal barrage of these green men was all too true, but orders were orders and war was war. I tried to console these boys by telling them that they probably would receive several months of training in France before going into active service. But they were not to be consoled. Knowledge of their unpreparedness only added to their helplessness. But democracy had to be saved and we had to win this war. If seasoned, well-trained soldiers were not available, then the green, raw recruits had to go to fill up the ranks that had been thinned by gunfire at the front.

I shall never forget one man of this group as he sat on his bunk just before marching to the train. He swore profusely. He cursed those in authority for allowing our country to be so unprepared. He accused them of being murderers for sending him into active service with no training. He wanted to know why they all had not had military training in peacetime so that if they must fight they would know how and stand some chance—an equal one—for their lives.

It was about 3 p. m. on the same afternoon that we received the order to "fall in" these men and march them to the train. Several of these hundred men were from nearby points and had telephoned their parents early in the day that they were leaving. Parents came to camp to see them off. I hope that I shall be spared to see an equally pitiful sight again as the one that I saw as the troop train pulled out. Several mothers went into hysterics. They had seen their sons leave with fear in their hearts. Too late they realized that their sons were not prepared. One mother sobbed bitterly and exclaimed, "We did not raise our boy to be a soldier and here he is going to war untrained and a perfect target for an enemy soldier. If he is killed, I shall never forgive myself for not sending him to a military school. We would easily have given him a year of military training. But we could not foresee this. May God bless and help him."

If our present members of Congress had seen such scenes as I have mentioned, I am sure that our country would not be in the unprepared predicament in which we find ourselves today. Our country would be prepared to meet any emergency.

I have a boy growing up. Though not old enough as yet for military training, I have vowed that he surely will be prepared if I am possibly able to see that he gets it. I love him too much not to give him a chance for his life if his country ever calls him. If my country needs him, I shall want him to respond but only on the condition that my neighbor's boy and all other boys also respond to the call, therefore universal service and compulsory military training is the only sane, safe, and humanitarian answer to our dilemma.

It is unfair to expect the boys who are now in our Army and Navy to do all of our defending for us. It is unfair to them not to have others trained so that if they need help all can give it and give it quickly. The United States of America, our free country where we can live, love, and worship as we please, belongs to every loyal American, therefore all should defend it if need be. There should be no slackers and no favorites.

Mr. GILLETTE rose.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I bring these remarks very quickly to a close, but I yield first to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I was about to ask the eminent Senator to yield. I should like to have some information relative to fixing the training period at 1 year. Perhaps the Senator has covered it in his remarks, and I was so unfortunate as not to be present.

Mr. BURKE. No; I did not. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. GILLETTE. Can the Senator give us any information as to what type of training is to be given? Is it to be drill evolution? Is it to be training in specialties, and the handling of implements? Or is it to be training in discipline? If the type of training is specified, why, and on what basis of competent testimony, is it fixed on a 12-month period?

Mr. BURKE. I shall endeavor to answer the question, although the specific answer is to be found in the testimony in the hearings.

The bill which I introduced provided for 8 months' training. Those who worked over the bill considered that while that was not thoroughly adequate, possibly a satisfactory job could be done in 8 months. When General Marshall, Chief of Staff, came before the committee he stated that in his opinion about 18 months were required to properly train a soldier. He felt that the Army could do a very good job, however, in 15 months. Finally, after going over the matter together, the committee, the representatives of the Army and Navy, and others decided on the compromise of 1 year, which the Army insists is not really long enough; but the Army officers think they can do a good job and will do a good job in 1 year.

As to the other question, with respect to the nature of the training, the bill specifies nothing in that respect. However, I believe the testimony shows that it is the expectation that about one-fourth of the period—which, if the present provision for 12 months should stand, would be 3 months—would be spent in rudimentary physical training, getting the men in shape and giving them the elements of military training, tactics, and so forth. Then a certain period would be given in company formations. The reason why General Marshall and the others felt they needed the much longer period was that as modern wars are conducted it is necessary to have a considerable period of training in the use of great formations of troops. The latter part of the 12-month period would be spent in that activity.

However, I recommend to the Senator a detailed reading of the testimony of some of the witnesses, as I am not in position to give the details. In setting up a proposal under which certain men would be drawn from civil life and given military training, I suppose the only sensible thing to do would be not to say "This day at this hour you shall do thus and so," but turn it over to the men who are skilled in the matter of military training and leave it to them to work out the program.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator can give us some information—he may already have done so—about the compulsory military training system in Germany. How long a period of military training is in force there? At what age does the recruit come in? About what trained reserves would the Senator say are available in Germany today?

Mr. BURKE. I have not made any statement on that subject, and I am not able to make a statement, because I have not detailed information; but if the Senator from Florida has some definite information on the matter I shall be glad to yield to him to give it at this point.

Mr. PEPPER. I do not, except that I believe generally the minimum is 2 years, and that that plan has been in effect over a course of at least the past 5 years, so that in that time there must have been created a reserve of several million men with at least 2 years' training.

Mr. BURKE. I have no doubt that is correct.

I now draw to a conclusion, Mr. President.

Compulsory training in time of peace for service in time of war is the democratic method of preparation for national defense. Since it is generally recognized that every citizen in a free country owes a duty to submit to call in time of war to defend his country, it follows, as clearly as night the day, that the country owes to every citizen the duty to see that he is properly and adequately prepared in time of peace to render his most effective service in time of war.

There remains but one further consideration. In this democracy of ours we have a natural abhorrence of compulsion. We like to believe that the individual citizen will come forward voluntarily to do his duty. When danger immediately threatens, when we are actually involved in war, when the patriotic fervor of the people is aroused to the highest pitch, we may expect a larger outpouring of volunteers than at any other time. But they would come poorly prepared, unseasoned, lacking in the training essential to their own safety and to their fullest usefulness as part of an organization in which complete coordination is a prime essential. Even so, every emergency with which we have been confronted has given additional proof that the volunteer system is not the full answer. The Revolution, the War of 1812, the Civil War, and the World War, all show that we cannot safely place our reliance upon the volunteer system alone.

We conclude that the volunteer method, even in time of war, is inadequate to meet our needs. It is doubly so in time of peace. In order to get anything like the number of volunteers required to come forward and submit themselves for training, we should have to put on an intensive recruiting drive, with all it involves—bands, war films, white feathers for the reluctant, hysteria—all the things we should particularly avoid. Even then there would be delay, uncertainty, valuable time wasted, and in the end failure to recruit the required number.

Contrast with that the compulsory selective system. No ballyhoo. An orderly, dignified procedure under which every male citizen within the specified limits would register and be classified. Out of the entire group who disclosed the least ground for deferment there would be selected by lot the required number for intensive training. Those selected for training would be the fortunate ones. I venture to prophesy that the chief complaint, if any, will come not from those chosen to receive this worth-while training, but from the unfortunate ones not called, those who will for the time be denied the opportunity to have their Government fit them to fulfill their obligations as citizens.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. What is the enlistment period for the recruits who are now sought by the Army under the existing law?

Mr. BURKE. Three years.

Mr. PEPPER. That fact tends, therefore, to create a professional army, as contrasted with the citizens' army which is contemplated in the bill, does it not?

Mr. BURKE. I think so.

Mr. PEPPER. I dare say the Senator has heard the recruiting speeches made over the radio. I happened to hear one in Miami in July. The recruiting officer spoke over the radio three times a week, I believe, and he made the speeches as attractive as he could to induce young men to take up the Army as a career. He showed the advantage to young men of making the Army a career. Therefore it seems to me that to have a citizens' army properly trained is more characteristic of a democracy than to have a professional army for the defense of that democracy.

Mr. BURKE. I thank the Senator for his very helpful statement. It seems to me it covers the situation with exactness and clearness, and should carry weight.

Mr. President, I wish to read an editorial which appeared in the Washington News of August 5, entitled, "Unsafe Compromise."

UNSAFE COMPROMISE

Compromise on the compulsory military service bill is now being talked in Congress. A specific proposal is being drafted by Senator MALONEY, of Connecticut. It would go ahead with immediate registration, but defer the actual draft until the Army had tried to raise all the manpower it needs by a drive for 1-year volunteers, with the basic Army pay scale raised from $21 a month to $30.

On the House side, Representative EDMISTON, of West Virginia, contributed the suggestion that the recruiting drive should include bands, parades, rallies, patriotic speakers, demonstrations of what Army life can do for a young fellow, and all kinds of help from patriotic societies and service organizations.

Does this country want that? We think not.

Oh, the great drive could be staged, all right. The bands, the parades, rallies, the speakers could whip up a fine display of martial spirit. The patriotic societies could distribute white feathers and otherwise direct scorn at young men who refused to enlist. A good many could be shamed into the Army to escape being called slackers.

Who would be the recruits obtained by this method? Many would be men who should stay at home to work in defense industries or support dependents. Many would be poor men. The difference between $21 a month and $30 would be no inducement to the sons of wealth. The Maloney-Edmiston plan might do much to force the sensitive and hungry to enlist.

But would it raise all the manpower needed? There is every reason to believe that it would not. The volunteer system never has provided sufficient manpower in a major crisis of modern war. Adoption of the Maloney compromise would mean, we think, only delay in adequately manning the defenses we are building to preserve peace. After a few months—a few months that might prove fatal—the draft would have to go into operation after all.

The brave, the forthright, the safe course is to put it into operation now. It will insure adequate manning of our defenses. And the principle of selective service will bring into training only the men the Army needs, not those who are essential at home and not those who can be goaded into volunteering or whose poverty makes $30 a month an attractive wage.

Mr. President, that is all I desire to say at this time in favor of the general principle of compulsory selective military training in time of peace for service in time of war. Later I shall join with others in further answer to any specific objections which may be urged.

Mr. WHEELER obtained the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. AUSTIN. I repeat the previous announcement that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, those who advocate compulsory selective service generally predicate their advocacy on two contentions. These contentions are: First, that large numbers of additional men are immediately needed for the Army and Navy, and that this large number cannot be obtained by the traditional American method of voluntary enlistment; second, that conscription is the method of raising the needed men most consonant with a democratic form of government.

I am glad to know that since this argument started the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] and I think my distinguished colleague from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] have to some extent corrected the idea which has been prevalent in the press, namely, that conscription is essential in order to get the necessary number of men and that this method is proposed to be used because we are unable otherwise to get the necessary number of men to fill up the Army quota.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WHEELER. I do.

Mr. BURKE. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that he understood the position I had taken was that it is not necessary to have a selective service bill to get the necessary number of men?

Mr. WHEELER. To fill the Army quota.

Mr. BURKE. Oh, to fill the Army quota?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. Of the present standing Army?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BURKE. I did not understand that part of the Senator's statement. I think probably that is correct.

Mr. WHEELER. I said that because of the fact that not only commentators but editorials in various newspapers throughout the country have carried to the general public the idea that it is necessary to have conscription because the Army otherwise could not get the necessary number of men.

It is to be noted at the outset that these contentions are to some extent necessarily interrelated. If the Nation were in imminent danger and required 10,000,000 men for its defense, and only a half million came forward, it would doubtless be both necessary and equitable to select by lot the necessary number from among the available manpower of the Nation able to serve, with due allowance for the needs of industry and the public welfare. On the other hand, if but 10,000 men were needed, and more than that number offered to serve, few persons would argue that it is either necessary or desirable to insist upon impressing into the military service men who, for one reason or another, do not wish to enter.

Those who urge compulsory service at the present time, and particularly the proponents of the pending Burke-Wadsworth bill, contend that we are now confronted with precisely the sort of situation first outlined; namely, that large numbers of men are immediately required for the Army and Navy to defend the Nation, and that the men required cannot be obtained without resort to compulsory service. This is the argument which was used very recently by the proponents of the bill. This contention cannot survive any sort of reasonably close examination. I think there has been a general misapprehension of the situation upon the floor of the Senate, because Members of the Senate have said to me that the attention of the Senate should be called to the fact that the Army quotas can be filled without compulsory draft; and many of them were surprised, and even representatives of newspapers in the press gallery were surprised, to find that the Army quotas had been filled, and that the Army could get and had gotten for the quotas more men than they could handle.

THE NECESSITY FOR RESORT TO COMPULSORY SERVICE—THE SITUATION WHICH CONFRONTS US

That the military events of the last year and the existing world situation generally bespeak need on the part of this Nation for increased and more effective defense, only the most foolhardy would deny. That the defense measures should be great enough to counterbalance and outweigh the dangers which call them into being is likewise merely elementary common sense. But common sense also dictates that the magnitude of these defense measures should bear some justifiable relation to, and be proportioned on, the magnitude and imminence of the dangers which are evident or reasonably calculable.

Nothing is so inexorably certain in the life of men as death. It may come to any of us tomorrow, and must come to all of us sooner or later. Reasonable providence therefore impels most of our citizens to carry insurance against this event; yet, despite its certainty, few of us deem it wise to purchase life insurance to the point where life is reduced to a process of striving for funds to pay for insurance against death. Some of our citizens, however, seek today to enslave the Nation to pay for overwhelming insurance against a danger which exists, but which possesses none of the elements of that inescapable certainty to be found in the lives of every one of us.

The great body of our citizenry, it is certain, would wish to bring to bear upon the Nation's problems the same practical good sense which they apply in the affairs of their own lives. They desire to take out and pay for an adequate amount of insurance against a foreseeable danger, but they do not wish to assume a load of obligation so heavy that it will bring about the very event they seek to insure against. The American people certainly do not wish to find, as the people of other lands have found to their sorrow, that they have been sold a back-breaking load of so-called insurance which turned out not to be worth the paper it is written on.

For those who are imbued not merely with fear but with complete certainty that the Nation is on the verge of invasion by a great armed force, no cost will seem too high to resist the impending invasion. On the part of most of our citizens and almost all military experts, however, armed invasion of our Nation in the foreseeable future, even assuming the defeat of Great Britain, is regarded as a very slim possibility indeed. This is not to say that the possibility does not seem greater today than it did a year ago, or that other dangers have not become clearly apparent; but few of us in our calm moments believe that what is necessary is the massing of the Nation's manpower on the shores of our country to repel an armed invasion.

We do believe, however, that while avoiding hysteria and foolish excesses, adequate sums of money should be appropriated to provide the Army and Navy with the most modern and efficient equipment obtainable, in ample quantity, and that steps should be taken to insure efficient production of military supplies by the Nation's industry. We believe, as well, that an increase in our armed forces is called for by the situation of the moment. We believe, however, and on this point all expert opinion is in agreement, that it is far more important for our troops to be thoroughly trained and expert in the new mechanical warfare, and ably commanded, than that they be merely numerous. Numbers, in modern warfare, not only do not compensate for lack of expertness, but by multiplying the deficiency they actually increase the danger. Nor do numbers compensate for lack of expert generalship, or expert planning. A small but expert force of Germans seized all of Norway. A small but expert Finnish army held the Russian Goliath at bay for many months. But a large French army was quickly crushed, less by the enemy than by its own incompetent and, in many instances, traitorous generals. A vauntedly impregnable Maginot line was rendered worse than useless by the incompetent planning of the French general staff. The years of military training that the French people had undergone, the crushing burdens they had painfully borne for generations, all went for naught in the face of the lack of competence of the French general staff.

HOW LARGE AN ARMY DO WE WANT?

Today our Army stands at a strength of 255,000 officers and men, and will soon be at its full authorized strength of 375,000; in 1939 the number was 134,000. The National Guard stands at 230,000 men, with the number increasing rapidly. The Navy has 146,000 men and officers, and is increasing the number to 170,000, the full complement authorized, and this total presumably does not include the 34,000 men in the Marine Corps. The Navy, Admiral Nimitz has testified, has no trouble getting all the men it requires by enlistment; in fact, it has a waiting list of 7,000 men at the present time.

It is agreed the armed forces should be increased further. How much of an increase is desirable to provide for the national safety, having in mind the danger to this country and the problems of hemisphere defense?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The figures the Sentor has given, I assume, also do not include the several thousand officers and men in the United States Coast Guard, which organization, under the law, may be transferred to the Navy in time of emergency, and which constitutes one of the very finest bodies of men in the United States or in any other country, both in morale and efficiency.

Mr. WHEELER. That is my understanding. Outside the Army, all the most eminent military authorities of the country agree that a force of 400,000 to 600,000 would be entirely adequate. Hanson W. Baldwin, military expert of the New York Times, writes:

What are those requirements? The functions and responsibilities of our land forces are several. First, our Regular Army must provide garrisons and defenses for Army, Navy, and air bases now established, or to be established. This may require eventually 125,000 to 150,000 men, with the most heavily guarded points, the Panama Canal, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and several points in the Alaskan-Aleutian area. Second, the Regular Army must provide the nucleus or cadre for coast defense and antiaircraft troops to make our continental base within the United States secure; it must have 8 to 15 men per plane to operate its air force; it must provide officers and instructors to train the National Guard and to form the skeletal structure upon which a large mass army may be built up in case of necessity after M day. And, under our broadened responsibilities of hemisphere defense, it has another function of recent development.

Mind you, he is calling attention to the fact that he is including in this the men who may be necessary even for hemisphere defense.

Under our broadened responsibility of hemisphere defense, it has another function of recent development. It must provide a field force, highly trained, fully equipped, instantly ready for transportation as an expeditionary force anywhere within the Western Hemisphere—to quell, with the help of the Navy and air force, alien-inspired revolutions, to seize an advanced base, to repel an attack or hold an area, until larger forces are transported, if necessary to assist it.

Mr. Baldwin says we need only 400,000 men, yet he wants a force large enough to go down and quell invasions in South America by what is supposed to be alien-inspired revolution.

Such a force certainly need be no larger than 150,000 men—perhaps half that number—about the number with which Germany, only 100 miles away, seized Norway. Adding to this the numbers required for the Army's other functions, the Regular Army, even to fulfill its broadened responsibilities, need be no larger than 400,000 men, if that large. Our present enlisted strength is about 280,000; a further increase is indicated, but it should not be hard to fill the necessary quota by voluntary recruiting.

Maj. George Fielding Eliot, author of The Ramparts We Watch, proclaiming agreement with the principle of compulsory service, testifying before the Committee on Military Affairs, warned against the illusion of military strength which an ill-trained army of millions would create, without the substance, and advises that a force no larger than 600,000 should be raised. He said:

I think we want to concentrate, first of all, on raising our Regular Army to the strength which the War Department considers necessary, so that there may be five or six hundred thousand men—I have not seen the estimate, but that would give us a respectable force to begin with. It is probable we could not now begin, with the Regular Army at the strength it is, to take more than 350,000 men additional economically, which would give us about 600,000, and if we begin with that we would be doing as well as we possibly can for the next year or so. There is no use trying to spread ourselves over any greater territory than that.

If you plan now that your Regular Army shall be 600,000 men, eventually you can reduce the number of men you maintain with the colors to about 300,000, when you get fully trained reservists available, but that does not mean men who have had 6 or 8 months' service. That means men that have had 2 years' service at least, and men then who are called back for refreshening periods afterward. If we do not study the experience of the people in Europe who depended on these short-service armies, we are not applying the lessons that we ought to learn from others.

Col. Frederick Palmer, in a newspaper article headed "United States invasion fear held groundless," writes:

By spring we should have an army striking force of 200,000 men. German invasion with an equal number would be hopeless.

But we should keep constant watch and be able to match and overmatch any probable attack with sufficient sea, land, and air power and have the resources for prompt production of munitions and thoroughly trained reserves to draw upon. The danger is that we shall get an extravagant, unbalanced preparedness whose continuance in thorough form we shall neglect when we are lulled into security.

Basil C. Walker, writing in the July Current History and Forum, states:

Keeping in mind the situation in this hemisphere, the forces available in other American countries, and the problem of transporting large bodies of enemy troops and equipment to this continent, a total authorized strength for our Regular Army of 400,000 men (as against the present authorized strength of 280,000) seems enough. Any provisions, plans, or laws looking to a substantially greater figure should be examined most critically, for they would suggest preparation for another great expeditionary force to another hemisphere. Such plans might represent, unintentionally, an undermining of our individual liberties at home.

Thus, in the judgment of 3 military experts of recognized eminence, the present situation calls for an army not exceeding 400,000; in the judgment of the fourth, not exceeding 600,000, with the number to be halved when there is an adequate force of fully trained reservists.

In view of what has been printed in the press, it is surprising to find, on turning to the statements of our highest Army authorities, that their views do not seem to differ materially from the quoted views of the military experts. At the recent hearings before the Senate Military Affairs Committee, General Marshall, Chief of Staff of the Army, testified as follows:

Senator HILL. General, how many do you have in the Regular Army today?

General MARSHALL. At the present time I think our strength is about 255,000 men.

Senator HILL. And you would like to build that 255,000 men up to what?

General MARSHALL. A peacetime strength of 375,000; but we first want the strength that is urgently necessary, which is 335,000, and we will build it up to that as rapidly as possible. That embraces all of the ground forces; the remaining 40,000 to go to 375,000 is for the Air Corps to handle the equipment that is to be delivered at some future date.

* * * * * * *

Senator THOMAS. Getting back to the question of the National Guard. I understood you to say that you wanted to mobilize the National Guard at once?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator THOMAS. And how many additional men would that give you?

General MARSHALL. That would give us about 230,000 on mobilization; but when such a measure as this becomes effective, the National Guard would be brought up to about 375,000, or a little short of 400,000.

Senator THOMAS. If we pass this bill authorizing conscription of these additional men, then will you need the National Guard after that?

General MARSHALL. We should have the National Guard at least 4 weeks before the first men under this bill report for duty and for about a year at least.

Senator THOMAS. Then you said you needed 375,000 men. Is that in addition to the National Guard?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. We would make an allotment of men to the National Guard which would carry them up from about 230,000 to just a little short of 400,000; the allotment of men to the Regular Army would carry it up to about 500,000.

Senator THOMAS. Are you speaking also of the men needed in the air forces?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator THOMAS. That is included?

General MARSHALL. That includes everything, except replacements.

* * * * * * *

Senator HILL. General, I want to get those figures. You have today 255,000 men in the Regular Army; is that right?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator HILL. As I understood it, you said a little while ago you would step those up to 375,000; then you used the figure 500,000.

General MARSHALL. Five hundred thousand is war strength, sir.

Five hundred thousand is war strength, he stated. Are we going to war? We found an Assistant Secretary of War stating that we needed something over a million men, yet General Marshall says that 500,000 is war strength.

General MARSHALL. Five hundred thousand is war strength, sir. * * * I might inject here a comment regarding proposals that have been made to increase the Regular Army to 750,000 men. If that were done, two things would happen.

This is not a statement of someone who is opposed to the Army; this is not a statement of someone who is opposed to building up our defense; this is the testimony of General Marshall, and I read his statement again:

I might inject here a comment regarding proposals that have been made to increase the Regular Army to 750,000 men. If that were done, two things would happen. We would have either to organize units from the ground up without any trained personnel to leaven the mass, which would require about a year, or we would have to emasculate existing units in the Regular Army in order to provide nuclei for new units. I do not think that we should take such a hazard as that at the present time. Another and still more serious effect would be that we would have to emasculate the National Guard in order to find the necessary equipment for the new units. This would mean a complete alteration of the present system of national defense.

If the Army is increased to 750,000 men, it will be necessary to emasculate the National Guard in order to find the necessary equipment. If there is not available the necessary equipment for 750,000 men in the Regular Army, with what will the 400,000 men it is proposed to call in October be equipped?

I call the Senate's attention to the fact that, according to newspaper reports the other day, those engaged in maneuvers were using pieces of pipe for guns, and trucks labeled "tanks" were used for tanks to train the men the Army officers say they want to help train.

The reason set forth is not the real reason why they want to get these men into the Army; it is not the real reason back of the desire to bring about conscription. Anyone who is at all familiar with the situation knows that the reason for the attempt to bring about conscription at the present time is not because of national defense.

When the full testimony of General Marshall is supplemented by the testimony of General Shedd, Colonel Twaddle, and Major Hershey, all of whom testified for the General Staff, the following facts are ascertained:

First. The General Staff and the War Department see no need for millions of soldiers and freely confess that it would be both unwise and impossible to attempt to induct into the Army any such huge force as the public is accustomed to hear named.

I submit that throughout the press and on the radio there has been propaganda carried on that we need these huge numbers of men in the Army, and that the only way we can get them is by conscription. There has been a deliberate attempt upon the part of somebody to bring this about. Never before, since I have been a Member of the Senate, have I seen such a complete unity of the press of the country in attempting to mislead the people upon this issue. It may be that the press has been misled by the proponents of this proposal. Is there any wonder that Senators rise on the floor at times and ask about a free press when they see only one side of the case presented, and only that side which tries to frighten the people with respect to the necessity of conscripting the youth of the United States of America?

Someone said to me the other day that the reason why we ought to have conscription of American youth is that our young men are growing up today without respect for our institutions. Men have respect for their institutions in accordance with the respect those institutions deserve. That has always been the case and always will be the case in any government. If those who head the executive, the judicial, and the legislative branches of the Government deserve respect, then the people will respect them, and when they do not deserve respect, then the people lose respect for them and the institutions they represent, and governments go down.

Second. What the General Staff actually believes is necessary from a military point of view at the present time is to increase the Army's strength immediately from 255,000 to 375,000 and to increase the strength of the National Guard from 230,000 to 400,000, a total increase of 290,000 men. Thereafter it may wish to step up the strength of the Army further to 500,000 in order to place the Army on a full war footing. This would require an additional 125,000 men, making the entire increase of 415,000 men. In this manner we would obtain an army of a half million men, and a National Guard force of 400,000 men to act as a reserve army.

In addition, the General Staff wishes to call out the National Guard for a year of intensive service, so that the guard will be raised to a level of adequate efficiency, which everyone candidly admits it does not at the present time even remotely approach.

Third. This is all the General Staff considers necessary from a military point of view.

Mr. President, if one were to listen to some of those who are hysterical, even some in this body, some outside, and some columnists who are more interested in Europe than they are in America, who refer to those who do not want to give a part of our defenses to England and a part of them to some other country as being "fifth columnists," he might think that those who do not want to increase the Army to two or three million men are not patriotic citizens.

The 4,000,000 men who would be raised by a selective conscription law such as the Burke-Wadsworth bill would form some sort of reserve body. But, as has been pointed out, the National Guard is to be increased to 400,000 and intensively trained so as to constitute an effective reserve force for the Army. In addition to the present Army strength of 255,000 and the National Guard strength of 230,000, one military expert claims we have 153,000 additional men in the Organized Reserve, made up mainly of noncommissioned officers—Walker Current History Forum for July 1940. Nothing was said about these reserves, however, by the General Staff officers who testified at the hearings on the Burke-Wadsworth bill, as I read the testimony. The General Staff does not believe a reserve force of millions is necessary to act as a reserve force for the National Guard in order to provide for the national defense. Nor does the General Staff believe that these millions of conscripts would constitute an effective body of troops if it was ever sought to use them. It does not, in fact, seriously count upon these men to serve any important military purpose for defense needs, nor did any of those who testified on behalf of the General Staff testify or indicate that it regards this large body of conscripts as necessary for defense.

Nowhere in the testimony will there be found statements by Army officers that the large body of men proposed to be conscripted is necessary for the defense of this country.

I shall shortly deal at length with the reasons why the General Staff actually seeks to have compulsory service enacted, as established by its own testimony.

In summary, then, it is seen that eminent military authorities outside the Army believe an army of from 400,000 to 600,000 is needed for adequate defense under present emergency conditions, and the General Staff favors a war-strength army of 500,000 plus a well-trained National Guard of 400,000, making necessary the raising of 290,000 men almost at once, and an additional 125,000 somewhat later, or a total of 415,000. If the General Staff's judgment be accepted at its face value, the question which must next be considered is whether, in order to obtain these men, conscription is necessary.

IS IT NECESSARY TO RESORT TO CONSCRIPTION TO OBTAIN THE ADDITIONAL SOLDIERS DESIRED BY THE ARMY?—HAS THE ARMY BEEN GETTING ITS QUOTA BY VOLUNTARY ENLISTMENT?

In the face of the numerous statements which have appeared in the press and elsewhere as to the impossibility of obtaining more than the merest fraction of the men required for the Nation's defense by voluntary enlistment, it is interesting to note that General Marshall, Chief of Staff, made no claim that the necessary men could not be obtained through enlistment.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] yesterday pointed out that from one end of the country to the other, particularly, if I may remind the Senate, in the Middle West, the West, and the South, the quotas were being overfilled. Where is it that difficulty has been encountered in getting enlistments? To a large extent it has been along the eastern seaboard. It has not been in the West, or the South, or the Middle West, but along the eastern seaboard—in that very section where men are howling and crying the loudest for conscription. That was true in the last war, and it is true today.

On the contrary, General Marshall definitely stated that the men could be obtained by enlistment, but not, he thought, as quickly as necessary. Listen to this testimony from the hearings before the Senate committee:

Senator HILL. All right, now, can you get that 335,000 under the present system of volunteer enlistments?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; we can; but we cannot get them rapidly enough.

How does he know that the Army cannot get them rapidly enough? He does not know, and it is impossible for him to know.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator pointed out a few minutes ago that there was no shortage of enlistments in the Middle West, the West, and the South, but that there is a shortage on the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator feel that it is fair to make the South, and the West, and the Middle West do the fighting for the Atlantic seaboard?

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator from Texas that someone said to me last night that there was only one reason why he thought conscription ought to prevail, and that was because the section from which come those who are calling loudest for conscription, those who are howling that Hitler is coming over here, and that we ought to conscript men and get into this war and fight, was the section doing the least to bring about enlistments.

Mr. CONNALLY. That might be true; but that is one of the best arguments for conscription.

Mr. WHEELER. I shall come to the question of democracy a little later.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not press the Senator, but he adverted to the fact that those on the rich industrial Atlantic seaboard will not volunteer and do not want to fight; yet he is willing to have volunteers from the West and the Middle West do the fighting, while the other fellows remain at home.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Let me suggest that the shortage is not so much in the East as compared with the West, but in the industrial districts as compared with the more or less rural districts.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. TAFT. That is because $21 a month looks very much smaller to a mechanic as compared with the scale of wages customary in the city than it does to a boy in the country.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The Senator believes in conscription in wartime, does he not?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. If war should come, those in the East would be conscripted, and under the conscription plan every community would be given full credit for those who had volunteered or enlisted in the armed forces of the Nation.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. So in wartime the whole matter would be completely equalized.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. I thank the Senator very much for calling attention to that matter.

Mr. President, who is calling for the conscription bill? Certainly the demand is not coming from the Middle West. If anyone thinks it is coming from the Middle West, let him go there. If anyone accepts the Gallup poll and wishes to prove that there is nothing to it, let him go into the Middle West.

During the Democratic convention the mayor of Chicago, speaking before the platform committee, said that he had canvassed every district and every precinct in the city of Chicago, and that the sentiment against our involvement in this war in any way was 16 to 1. When one gets west of the Allegheny Mountains and away from Washington, he gets away from the war hysteria:

Continuing with the testimony:

Senator HILL. All right, now, can you get that 335,000 under the present system of volunteer enlistments?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; we can; but we cannot get them rapidly enough.

General Marshall was asked about the rate of Army enlistments. He testified as follows:

Senator DOWNEY. About what is the volume of enlistments monthly now in the Army?

General MARSHALL. In June we went ahead with enlisting the force without all of the funds necessary and had to be a little cautious until the appropriation bill was actually signed; but I think we secured 18,000 men in June. Our quota, which we assigned ourselves, was about 15,000 by the end of the month, and we reached the 15,000 10 days before the end of the month. In other words, recruiting went ahead in good shape.

Senator DOWNEY. You mean, General, that that number of men were actually selected by the Army—accepted?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator DOWNEY. About how many, or what proportion, was rejected because of physical and mental deficiencies?

General MARSHALL. About one-third of the applicants were rejected. I might say that we have been able to secure a remarkably fine lot of men from the viewpoint of high-school and college education. We were frankly dubious about what we would be able to obtain from what I might call the hard-bitten services, where the men have to slough through the mud—the Infantry and Artillery—and not get much publicity. * * * But we have been able to recruit splendid young fellows since we started last September with the first increase of 17,000. I have talked with four or five hundred of them at various places, and almost invariably have found them to be high-school men, many high-school graduates, with a fair sprinkling of college men. I think we have taken less than about 35 percent who are not college graduates. * * *

When we were in the city of Chicago I talked with a newspaperman on one of the leading newspapers in the city of Chicago. He told me that his newspaper was about to put on a campaign to get men to enlist in the Army. Representatives of the newspaper went over to the recruiting office, and the recruiting office stated that it did not want the newspaper campaign because of the fact that it could not handle all the men who were coming to it at that time. Yet we talk about conscription in order to get the number of men necessary to fill the Army because they cannot be obtained otherwise.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. It is my recollection that General Marshall, in his statement before the committee, said that a quota of 15,000 was fixed for the month of June.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. OVERTON. But that was not the full quota which the Chief of Staff would have liked to have. That was all he anticipated he would be able to get under a voluntary system. His expectations were exceeded by some 3,000, and 18,000 enlisted.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. OVERTON. But, as a matter of fact, General Marshall would have desired a larger quota than even the 18,000 had he thought that by the voluntary system that number of men would have enlisted.

Mr. WHEELER. I have just quoted General Marshall's direct words, so there can be no question about the matter. He said:

In June we went ahead with enlisting the force without all of the funds necessary and had to be a little cautious until the appropriation bill was actually signed; but I think we secured 18,000 men in June. Our quota, which we assigned ourselves, was about 15,000 by the end of the month, and we reached the 15,000 10 days before the end of the month. In other words, recruiting went ahead in good shape.

That is his exact language.

Mr. OVERTON. Did he not also point out, elsewhere in his statement, about how long it would take to raise a force of 1,200,000 men at the rate of 18,000 a month?

Mr. WHEELER. Let me call the attention of the Senator to what I said a moment ago when I quoted General Marshall. What he said was wanted for the Army was not 1,200,000 men, but enough men to fill the Army to the wartime standard. The Army wanted 500,000 men, and according to his own testimony it wanted a reserve of 400,000 men.

Mr. OVERTON. Let me see if I understand the Senator. As I understand, General Marshall was then speaking of the Regular Establishment.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. OVERTON. General Marshall in his statement not only did not oppose the bill, but, on the contrary, expressed himself enthusiastically in favor of the Burke-Wadsworth bill.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not disputing that; but what I am trying to point out is that stories have been disseminated over the radio by columnists; they have been disseminated by editorials in many newspapers from one end of the country to the other, to the effect that we must have conscription in order to get the men necessary to fill the Regular Army.

The other day when the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] was speaking, and on another occasion when I was speaking, the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] said "You voted for the defense appropriations, did you not?" I said "Yes." Then he said, "Why are you unwilling to vote to get enough men to man the equipment?"

According to General Marshall, 500,000 men are needed. If we take the opinions of some of the armchair generals in New York, some of the newspapermen, and some of the lawyers, of course, they say that 1,200,000 men are needed now. General Marshall said the Army could not use 750,000 men in the Regular Army at the present time.

Thus it is indisputable that enlistment in the Army, instead of being negligible, as is generally believed, has been running well above the Army's quota. During the month of June, when the Army was proceeding cautiously with its recruiting, approximately 27,000 men presented themselves for enlistment, of whom 18,000 were accepted. According to recent newspaper reports, enlistment during July has set new high figures. This is true despite the fact that it cannot seriously be claimed that recruiting is being pushed under a high-pressure selling campaign.

Many of us can truthfully say that in the past few months we have not encountered any of the usual indications of a great drive for recruiting—no posters, no newspaper advertising, no radio announcements, no constant reiteration of the call for volunteers. This does not mean there has been none, but it certainly means that whatever there has been is not the type of selling drive which permeates every corner of the country and every stratum of our citizenry, so as to reach every man who might voluntarily respond to the appeal. Does it not follow as a matter of course that a really effective campaign of this nature would produce men in even far greater numbers than those who have thus far come forward?

There are two other considerations of the greatest immediacy in their effect upon enlistment: The minimum period for which a man may enlist; the salary received at the start; and the opportunity for advancement thereafter.

DOES THE ARMY WANT TO ENCOURAGE VOLUNTARY ENLISTMENTS?

The Army's policy is to accept enlistments for a minimum period of 3 years. As the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and others have recently pointed out, it cannot be doubted that large numbers of young men who would be entirely willing to enlist for 1 year are not willing to tie themselves down for a 3-year period.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Evidently the Senator is not aware that during the past year and a half, perhaps 2 years—I do not know the exact coverage of time—the Army has followed another rule, that of accepting voluntary enlistments for a period of a year?

Mr. WHEELER. I did not know that such a rule had existed for any such length of time as a year; in fact, I thought it was only put into effect a very short time ago. I ask the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee what date was it that the Army put into effect the rule permitting enlistments in the Army for a year's time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It has been the law for some time.

Mr. WHEELER. For how long?

Mr. SHEPPARD. For many years.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no; at least, that is not my information.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is a matter that can be easily verified, because it is in the record of the hearings. I cannot put my finger on it, because I have not the hearings before me, but I am sure it can be easily checked up.

Mr. WHEELER. I have some of the testimony here, and I will read what General Shedd said before the committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am pretty sure it has not only been in effect for many years but it has been utilized mainly for preparation of enlisted men for West Point.

Mr. WHEELER. That is quite a different thing. When young men are permitted to enlist in the Army for 1 year in order that they may prepare themselves for West Point, that is quite a different thing from taking them into the Regular Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. They always have the option of enlisting for regular service.

Mr. WHEELER. I am amazed to hear the Senator say that, and I will call attention to the testimony of one of the generals of the Army. At the Senate Military Affairs hearings General Shedd, the Assistant Chief of Staff, testifying for the General Staff, conceded, "There is a difference there."

Let me call attention to a portion of his testimony:

Senator THOMAS of Utah. Now, have we ever tried in the Army a voluntary arrangement for a year's service or for 8 months' service, as this bill provides, or for 15 months, as the general (Marshall) would like to have?

General SHEDD. No, sir.

That was the testimony which was brought out in answer to questions by the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], who is now on the floor of the Senate. That was the testimony given by General Shedd at the hearing. Now it is said that the 1-year enlistment rule has been in effect for 4 years. If it has been, General Shedd did not know what he was talking about when he testified before the committee or else he misled the committee.

I read further from the testimony:

Senator THOMAS of Utah. So that is a very important factor. There is a difference in a young man's thinking about himself if he can go out and train for a year and make himself a Regular Army man for 3 years; there is a quite a difference.

General SHEDD. There is a difference there.

Senator THOMAS of Utah. Has it ever been contemplated to use, for example, the great list of—and I am only using this as an example—the great list of the 2,000,000 names of the former enrollees in the C. C. C. for approaching them on a year's enlistment? I ask that question because the C. C. C. enlistments were for a short period, and they always had more men than they could take; and I was pleased to learn that—General Marshall informed us today—that the applications for enlistment in the Army were greater than we had been told in the press. We have been informed that we were having great difficulty in meeting the quotas that the Army is planning for. Now that is hardly true, is it?

General SHEDD. We are getting them faster than we thought we would. That is correct, sir.

Where is the evidence to the contrary? I am sorry the Senator from Vermont has temporarily left the Chamber.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. In the last part of the quotation the Senator has read appears the reason for my question. Reading in the newspapers for some months that the Army could not get volunteers, and having information that it was not up to its quota, I thought it ought to be brought out, and I asked those questions for that very reason. I think it will be found that the 1 year's enlistment is generally for young men of the student class, who are trying to qualify for West Point appointments or something of that kind, and they enter the Army more to go to school than to give over their lives for a 3-year period in the Army.

Mr. WHEELER. That is my understanding. I think it was mentioned on the floor of the Senate that the Army had put in force such a rule, but I went through the record and read General Shedd's testimony to the effect that they had not. I saw that such a rule was not invoked, and I thought it would make a difference.

The testimony of General Shedd and General Marshall brings home an astounding proposition. Our General Staff is recommending that there now be imposed on the men of this country by compulsion a 1-year term of service for which the Army has always refused, and even now refuses, to permit our men to enroll voluntarily. This may seem a strange paradox, devoid of logic, but in fact it represents the considered judgment of the General Staff. For, the truth of the matter is that although the Nation has been led to believe that the Army seeks conscription because it is necessary for national defense, the Army desires conscription whether or not the necessary men can be obtained by enlistment. Here is the testimony of General Shedd upon that question:

Senator THOMAS of Utah. Now, if we may go back to the first enlistments. Would it not be worth while to experiment with that for a time?

General SHEDD. I do not think so.

Then follow his reasons:

I feel that regardless of whether we can procure the men by voluntary enlistments or not, the principles of selective service are so fair, so just, and so democratic they produce the men we need at the time they need them; they spread the requirements of military service over the entire personnel of the country in such a just and proper way that I believe that those reasons are so compelling we should adopt selective service even if we could fill our requirements by voluntary enlistments.

There we have the position of the Army. They want conscription even though they can get men by voluntary enlistment. We have heard so much about conscription being so democratic. I propose before I get through, a little later on, to point out to the Senate and cite conclusive evidence that, as a matter of fact, the selective service about which we hear so much as being democratic is not democratic in the slightest degree. I want to point it out not by what anybody else has said but by what the Army officials themselves say.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I simply want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that he does not have to go back to the last war to find the tendency of the Army to discriminate against troops voluntarily enlisted as against troops who are drafted. That was shown in the last war when they took the National Guard divisions that were made up of voluntary enlistments and put them in tent camps throughout the country, while they took the National Army and put them in steam-heated cantonments. I know, I put in a winter at Fort Sill, Okla., one of the coldest winters of current history, with the thermometer much of the time below zero. There the men were housed in tents, and became infected with spinal meningitis, measles, mumps, and almost every other ill to which the flesh is heir, while all the National Army divisions were quartered in steam-heated cantonments. I am not criticizing the fact that they were put in steam-heated cantonments, but I do say there was not any rhyme or reason for discriminating against National Guard divisions merely because they were made up of men who had voluntarily enlisted.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator. I repeat what I said a moment ago, that we find in the testimony of General Shedd that the Army wants to conscript men. What they want is to have permanent conscription so that they can get the men at any time, whether men want to enlist or not. In other words, even if a man wants to be in the Army and desires to make that his life work, they may say to him, "No; we will not take you; we are going to take somebody who does not want to make it his life work." Is there anything democratic about that?

General Shedd's views on the fairness and democracy of selective service I intend to discuss at a later point. What we are here concerned with is the fact that the country and Congress have been led to believe that they must agree to conscription because the requirements of national defense in the present emergency cannot possibly be met by the traditional American method of voluntary enlistment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment in order that I may make a correction?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. While the Senator was momentarily absent I read from the testimony of General Shedd, in which he said that the Army did not have a year's enlistment at the present time.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to correct or rather make more specific the statement I made regarding the time in which 1-year enlistments have been in effect. The existing law provides for such enlistments in section 628 of title 10 of the United States Code, reading as follows:

> Periods of enlistments and reenlistments, respectively: Original enlistments in the Regular Army shall be for a period of 1 or 3 years, at the option of the soldier, and reenlistment shall be for a period of 3 years.

General Marshall, in testifying in the hearings on Senate Joint Resolution 286, the National Guard measure, testified as follows:

Senator JOHNSON of Colorado asked this question:

> Senator JOHNSON of Colorado. Don't you think you could get them if you had only a 1-year service instead of 3?
> General MARSHALL. We have 1-year service right now. We advertised that a few days ago.
> Senator JOHNSON of Colorado. Are you getting any results?
> General MARSHALL. I can't give you the results of that advertising campaign, but I am convinced we cannot get the men.
> Senator JOHNSON of Colorado. These 16,000 are on the 3-year basis, are they not?
> General MARSHALL. Yes.
> Senator JOHNSON of Colorado. Have you enlisted any on the 1-year basis?
> General MARSHALL. A few; not many.

On further investigation I am convinced that even those are not enlistments generally in the Army, but enlistments for West Point.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. AUSTIN. If I can have unanimous consent, I will insert in the RECORD the report of such enlistments, representing the total number of enlistments for the years 1931 to 1940, for a period of 1 year.

Mr. WHEELER. Such enlistments in the Regular Army are only for students.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the table presented by the Senator from Vermont will be printed in the RECORD.

The table is as follows:

1-year enlistments

Year	Total	For West Point included in total
1931	72	51
1932	48	42
1933	97	93
1934	257	242
1935	180	171
1936	299	293
1937	399	295
1938	215	212
1939	258	243
1940	268	267

Mr. WHEELER. I called attention while the Senator was absent from the chamber to a question asked General Shedd by Senator THOMAS of Utah:

> Now, have we ever tried; in the Army, a voluntary arrangement for a year's service or for 8 months' service, as this bill provides, or for 15 months as the General (Marshall) would like to have?

General Shedd answered "No, sir."

> Senator THOMAS of Utah. So that is a very important factor.

The Senator from Utah asked:

> Has it ever been contemplated to use, for example, the great list of—and I am only using this as an example—the great list of 2,000,000 names of the former enrollees in the C. C. C. for approaching them on a year's enlistment?

General Shedd said he was in favor of a conscription policy rather than voluntary enlistments, even though the Army could get men by voluntary enlistment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to observe that apparently this is a matter of administration within the Army.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. AUSTIN. But that the authority exists in the law and has for a long time to accept the voluntary enlistments on a 1-year basis.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is original enlistments.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In addition to preparation for West Point, the Army has authority to enlist men for the regular service for 1 year.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. But the Army has not done it. What difference does it make if they have the authority and have not tried it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. But the Army has not declined the option and the law itself gives the option.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg the Senator's pardon. General Shedd says they have not got it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. If, in reading from the debates in another branch of Congress, I violate the rules, I expect promptly to be rebuked, and will not read further.

I read from a speech which appears in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at page 15614, delivered by Mr. EARL C. MICHENER, of Michigan. Senators who know him will agree with me that he is one of the ablest Members of the Congress of the United States, and is so recognized throughout the country.

Mr. MICHENER is an able lawyer. He himself had some doubt as to the existence of a law allowing 1-year enlistments. He wrote a letter on the subject to the War Department, and a reply was sent dated August 8. The letter of the Department is as follows:

Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of August 2, 1940, requesting information on the present provisions of the law and the regulations of the Department concerning the length of enlistments in the Regular Army at this time.

The act of June 4, 1920, authorized original enlistments in the Regular Army for a period of 1 or 3 years at the option of the soldier.

The Army regulations contain the following provisions:

"Original enlistments in the Regular Army are authorized to be made for 1- or 3-year periods but all reenlistments therein are restricted by law to 3-year periods. Men enlisted for 1-year periods will not be given original assignments or subsequent transfers where sea travel is involved, and assignments and transfers involving rail transportation may be made only as specifically authorized by the War Department. A man with any prior Regular Army enlisted service is not eligible for a 1-year enlistment in the Regular Army; however, prior service in the Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard is not a bar to the 1-year enlistment."

In recent years 1-year enlistments have not been encouraged since an efficient military force depends not only on the training of the individual soldier but also, and to a greater degree, on the coordinated training of all combat units that make up the fighting force. The rapid turnover and the short period of training that would result should 1-year enlistments be general for the Regular Army of 375,000 men would seriously hamper the development of efficient combat units in that component.

The War Department has recommended bringing into service for 1 year's training approximately 800,000 men in two increments. Only by bringing these trainees into the service in large groups can graduated instructions be given from the training of the individual through training of combat teams of all echelons. The staggering incident to any voluntary system would necessitate many classes of instruction throughout the year and seriously hamper efficient training.

I am enclosing a table showing the number of 1-year enlistments made since 1930.

Very respectfully,

E. S. ADAMS,
Major General, The Adjutant General.

1-year enlistments

	1931	1932	1933	1934	1935	1936	1937	1938	1939	1940

August	9	3			2	4			1
September	1	1	1	2		1	3	1	4
October				3	3	1	1	2	5	1
November	1		1	5	2		1		1
December		1		1
January	2	1		1					1
February	1						28
March				1			23		1

Total	72	48	97	257	180	299	399	215	258	268

Mr. MICHENER proceeds with his able speech as follows:

Attention is called to the fact that "in recent years 1-year enlistments have not been encouraged."

The above table, however, shows that some 1-year enlistments have been received even though this possibility of enlistment has not been publicized and has been discouraged by the War Department.

Mr. MICHENER further proceeds:

After receiving the above letter from the Adjutant General, I called up the United States Army recruiting station on Pennsylvania Avenue, in the city of Washington, by telephone, advising that I was a young man who wanted to enlist in the Army for a period of 1 year during this emergency. I was promptly told that 1-year enlistments were not being received by the recruiting stations and that the shortest period for which I could enlist was 3 years. I called the attention of the officer to the letter from the Adjutant General's office which I have included in these remarks, and then I told the recruiting officer who I was and he then admitted that 1-year enlistments were possible under the law, but gave me the substance of the regulations and advised that recruiting stations discouraged 1-year enlistments.

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. According to the information the Senator from Arizona has given, it seems to me that the recruiting stations not only have discouraged enlistments but the effect of their action has been to prohibit them.

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield to me?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish not to be in the attitude of a critic of the War Department, because nothing has ever been able to make a breach in the wall which surrounds the vast reservoir of ignorance I possess on military matters. No Senator could be more lamentably ignorant of military matters than am I; but my very ignorance on the subject makes me certainly an impartial observer; and it is my observation, and there is some evidence to the effect, that the War Department has not with strict fidelity carried out the law of the United States permitting 1-year enlistments.

But, Mr. President, I am so accustomed to departments and bureaus negativing laws passed by Congress that I have grown rather case-hardened about the matter. Possibly I should not have lapsed into this attitude of complacency toward bureaucratic rule. So I say again, the evidence, while not conclusive, is strong, to the effect that the War Department has not encouraged 1-year enlistments, but has discouraged them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield—

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know as to the truth of the statement, but it was carried in the Associated Press, I think, and the United Press dispatches—I saw it in several newspapers on the same day within the week—that if Congress passed a law for 1-year enlistments, the Navy Department was simply going to ignore the law. They made no bones about it, and said that if Congress passed a law for 1-year enlistments the Navy would ignore it. Whether that was by official release or not, I do not know; but I read it in a number of newspapers when I was on the train coming to Washington from St. Louis the other day.

Mr. WHEELER. I saw exactly the same statement in the newspapers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Navy do ignore it, they will not do any more than the Army have been doing for the past several years.

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly; the Army has ignored the law with reference to the matter.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BURKE. In order to complete the discussion of the subject of 1-year enlistments, I think the Senator should state the reason why the War Department and the Navy Department have not encouraged 1-year enlistments for the Regular Army, which is very clearly shown to be that they think the men who are going into the Regular Army ought to go into it for a long enough period and with sufficient continuity of service so that they may become more efficient in their work, and not have the constant turn-over that applies to the Regular Army, and has no application at all to the provisions of this bill for giving fundamental training to men who would then go into the Reserve, but would not be members of the Regular Establishment.

Mr. WHEELER. But what excuse can there be for the Army or the Navy taking that position? After all, the Congress of the United States is the policy-making body of the country. If the Congress of the United States lays down the law and says there may be voluntary enlistments for 1 year in the Army, whether it is bad for the Army or good for the Army, after all, it is the Congress of the United States which has determined the matter; and if the Departments are going to ignore the laws upon the statute books of the United States, what is the use of the Congress passing laws?

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one more brief interruption?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BURKE. Has the Senator read the law, and is he able to state that no discretion was left with the General Staff of the Army in determining whether they would accept 1-year enlistments or 3-year enlistments?

Mr. WHEELER. As I gathered from the law read just a moment ago, I do not think it gives the General Staff any discretion, because it expressly says that men may enlist for 1 year or for 3 years.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the law reposes the option with the person desiring to enlist, not with the Department.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is what I said.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. In my judgment, the Senator from Montana is on safe ground when he says it is not for the departments to decide what part of the law they will observe and what part they will ignore. It is the duty of the departments faithfully to carry out each and every part of the law and not willfully to neglect and obscure any particular part of the law, especially when the option rests with the man who proposes to enlist and not with the Department.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me in order to enable me to ask the able Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. MALONEY. If I correctly understood the Senator from Nebraska, he made reference in connection with his brief discussion of 1-year enlistments to the Regular Army. I am wondering if the Senator from Nebraska—assuming that he has not heretofore done so—would care to express a view concerning the 1-year provision of the bill now under discussion.

Mr. BURKE. I am very heartily in favor of the provision for 1-year enlistments, and, in addition to that, of all the other provisions of the so-called Maloney amendment, which is in the nature of a substitute, except the one postponing the application of the selective draft.

Mr. MALONEY. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point for a question?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The theory upon which the pending bill is based is that it takes practically a year of training to fit the ordinary citizen for duties in the Army. Of course, under this bill he is not to become a part of the Regular Army. He goes back into civilian life and becomes a part of the Reserve. If it be true that, although it is optional with the citizen to determine whether he shall enlist for 1 year or 3, and therefore not mandatory, and if it be true that it takes about a year to train a man to be an efficient soldier so that he would fit into the Regular Army—a situation which is a little different from what we are doing here—is there any reason why the Department of the Navy and the War Department also should not discourage 1-year enlistments as compared to 3-year enlistments, because as soon as the men were trained their enlistments would expire?

Mr. WHEELER. I am not passing on whether a 1-year enlistment or a 3-year enlistment is better. I am saying that when the Congress of the United States passes a law and provides that it shall be optional with a man who enlists whether he will enlist for 1 year or 3 years, and he is not permitted to enlist for 1 year, it makes a vast difference. I am weary and tired of Government departments, when we enact laws, setting themselves up as greater than the Congress, and ignoring the law. One of the things that is bringing this Government into disrepute is the fact that there are officials in the departments who ignore the will of the people, and ignore the laws which are placed upon the statute books.

Mr. BARKLEY. I doubt very much, in the first place, whether the Government is coming into disrepute. In the next place, I wish to say that I have no brief for the War Department or the Navy Department, and I do not understand that this law is mandatory. But if it be true that it takes practically a year to train a man, and the Government has been to the expense of training him for a year, it would not be strange if the War Department or the Navy Department, when a man comes to enlist, undertakes to persuade him to enlist for 3 years instead of 1.

Mr. WHEELER. But they have not persuaded them; they simply have not let them in.

Mr. BARKLEY. They have not encouraged them.

Mr. WHEELER. They have not encouraged them, and they have not let them in. That is the fact about the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The ordinary person who desires to enlist in the Army is not a lawyer.

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly not.

Mr. NORRIS. He probably does not know what the law is, but he desires to go into the Army. He gets his information from the official who, under the law, is entitled to receive his enlistment, and he asks him what the law is. According to what the Senator from Arizona has read us, they have told him blankly, "We are not receiving 1-year enlistments."

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, a man who desires to enlist is told, in effect, that the law provides for 3-year enlistments. When the law provides for 1-year enlistments, as well as 3-year enlistments, and gives a man the right to select, as seems to be undisputed now, there is no official in the War Department who has a right, under the law, if he is going to do any explaining, not to tell the applicant for enlistment that he can enlist for 1, 2, or 3 years. I do not see any objection to the War Department wanting him to enlist for 3 years; but, after all, it is for the man to decide, and unless they give him the information, they are not, as I see it, faithful servants of the Government which they represent.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator for his observation.

It has been the general impression throughout the country that a conscription law was needed because we could not get the necessary number in the Army without such a law. Senators have stated, "Well, you passed this appropriation bill making provision for the purchase of these war machines. Why are you not willing to pass a conscription law in order to get the men to handle the machines?"

It is certain that large numbers of our citizens consider the unescapable necessity of providing for the Nation's defense the only reason which ought to compel adoption of compulsory service, and they have been misled into believing it is precisely on this consideration alone that the present proposals for conscription are based. But the General Staff has revealed that its advocacy of conscription is compelled by considerations quite apart from the mere exigencies of defense.

General Shedd advanced still another reason why the General Staff feels conscription is to be preferred to voluntary enlistment. I read from his testimony:

General SHEDD. Where you have voluntary enlistments and turn to voluntary enlistments in large numbers, you have no control over where the man you accept comes from. He may be a key man in a vital industry, but if he comes up to enlist you accept him?

Senator REYNOLDS. Well, he is a volunteer.

General SHEDD. Yes. * * * Well, I believe it would tend more to disrupt the country, because you cannot pick and choose the unimportant man.

That is democracy.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I will yield in a moment.

I do not mean unimportant from his point of view, but unimportant in the whole economic life of our country. We have got these factories; we have got to produce certain things.

Senator REYNOLDS. But, if this man volunteered, it is a different proposition. Suppose you force him. * * *

General SHEDD. We would not force him. We would not take him.

Senator REYNOLDS. You would not take him at all?

General SHEDD. We would not take him at all.

Senator REYNOLDS. Then if he volunteered, he would be more of a detriment to his country?

General SHEDD. He is more important in his civilian job than he is in the Military Establishment.

Senator REYNOLDS. I am glad to hear you say that.

General SHEDD. We would rather have him over in that factory than to have him in the Army.

Senator REYNOLDS. Thank you.

General SHEDD. And that is why we feel that the selective service is better than voluntary enlistments.

In other words, if a man working in a factory wishes to make the Army his profession, the officials say to him, "No; go back. You are too important. We want to take the unimportant man." That is what they call democracy. That is what they call democracy in the selective service, permitting some Army officer to decide who the unimportant man is, who is to be taken, and letting some Army officer say, "You are too important. You are the fifth son of some rich man who may at some time inherit your father's fortune and run his business; so you are too important to be taken into the Army, even though you desire to make a profession of it."

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BURKE. I think there was never a more unfair statement made on the floor of the Senate than the Senator's comment on General Shedd's statement in that particular. I happen to know the particular type of case to which he was referring, and the reasons for his statement are self-evident.

Assume that the man General Shedd says they would not seek under the selective service—but if he comes as a volunteer, they must—to be a man in the machine-tool industry, in which there is a great shortage of machine-tool workers, and assume he is skilled and working as an instructor—I am told that a capable man can instruct 12 others in that industry—because he is healthy and able-bodied and of the right age, he finds that if he does not volunteer people make fun of him, and he comes up to volunteer, and he has to be accepted if he is a volunteer.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg the Senator's pardon; they do not have to accept him if he is a volunteer, and General Shedd says they would not have to take him if he volunteered.

Mr. BURKE. No; he did not say that.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I read his testimony.

Mr. BURKE. He means they would not take him under the selective-service law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the Senator mean to say that if a man appears at the recruiting office and desires to enlist in the Army it is requisite, under the law, for them to take him? I was well acquainted with the recruiting officer at St. Louis before I was married, and he used to laugh about the number of men he rejected. That was in the days when the Army was picking and choosing, and he rejected anyone he did not happen to want to take. That is a common custom. If the Senator does not know that, he is not familiar with the practice.

Mr. BURKE. They could reject him for physical defects, or some other cause, but they could not say to a man, "You are important in industry, and therefore we will not allow you to enlist." I do not think anyone can offer any facts to sustain such a contention.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, is the Senator familiar with the education system for industry which is being set up under Mr. Hillman and Mr. Owen D. Young? That activity is involved in getting workers for industry, and if a man such as the one described tried to volunteer, they would go to him and say, "Your duty is to stay at this plaint." If they could not persuade him, I should be very much surprised; and if they could not persuade anyone who was criticizing him, I should be very much surprised.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I gladly yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. It seems to me there is something especially remarkable about the bill the Senator is discussing which relates to this very point, which seems to be somewhat controversial. On page 15, line 20, is a proviso which was not in the original draft of the bill, but was the product of long study by the committee. It reads:

Provided, That any person between the ages of 18 and 35 shall be afforded an opportunity voluntarily to enlist and be inducted into the land or naval forces of the United States for the training and service prescribed in subsection (b), if he is acceptable to the land or naval forces for such training and service.

That is peculiar, in my judgment, because all the right is in the volunteer, and he would be accepted if he were qualified.

Mr. TAFT. No; if he is acceptable.

Mr. AUSTIN. That means if he is qualified under the law. There is that spread of right to choose. This does not give the Government any right to decide whether it will take him or not accept him. This is compulsory on the Government. The language is "shall be afforded."

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is not quoting the present law, he is quoting the pending bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am quoting the pending bill, which is peculiar and different.

Mr. WHEELER. We are talking about the present law.

Mr. AUSTIN. It differs from anything I have seen on the subject.

Mr. WHEELER. It is not in the present law.

As I have pointed out, I happened to be United States district attorney during the last war, and constantly came in contact with the draft boards. I do not mean to say it was so in a great many instances, but in some cases there were very serious injustices, and the boards did let out men whom they should not have excused. But when the power is placed in some man to say that one must go into the Army whether he desires to go or not, or that they will not take him if he desires to go, there is nothing democratic about that, when the power is placed in the hands of an Army officer. But I desire to proceed with my remarks.

Here is another of the inimitable paradoxes which the bill presents. We must conscript men, its advocates say—the national defense requires it. But the Army seems to think that national defense does not require the services of citizens whose skins happen to be dark. I quote from a letter from Walter White, eminent secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People:

By letter of July 23, 1940, Adjutant General Adams, of the War Department, states that Negroes are only permitted to enlist in two regiments of the infantry, two regiments of the cavalry, Quartermaster Corps, Medical Department, Ordnance Department, certain school detachments, and the detached enlisted men's list, and that "There is no provision for the enlistment of colored men in the remaining arms or services." Negroes are not permitted to enlist in the Air Corps. The Bureau of Navigation of the Navy Department, by letter of August 2, 1940, states: "After many years of experience, the policy of not enlisting men of the colored race for any branch of the naval service, except the messman branch, was adopted to meet the best interests of general efficiency. The selection of men to man the Navy is left to the discretion of the executive branch of the Government."

Negroes are willing to take their part in the defense program along with other American citizens, but at the same time insist that their Government give them the same opportunities to serve in all branches of the armed forces in which they may qualify without distinction or discrimination because of race or color. They expect and are entitled to the same rights and privileges as every other American.

Is there anyone, regardless of what his prejudices may be one way or the other against the colored race, who would say, "We ought to discriminate in the armed forces of the United States against a man because of his color or his race or his religion"?

These observations from a spokesman for the colored people are revealing. Thus, our Army and Navy are unwilling to permit our Negro citizens to offer their services willingly, but prefer through this bill to conscript them.

WHY THE ARMY DEMANDS CONSCRIPTION TO GET MEN, WHILE THE NAVY HAS A WAITING LIST

The starting pay in the Army for an enlisted man is $21 per month—approximately $5 per week. For most soldiers this also is the highest pay they know while they are in the service, for promotion of privates is admittedly rare. Former Secretary of War Woodring has said that 95 percent of the enlisted men never get above $21 per month. As compared with these prospects, a young man weighing the benefits of enlisting in the Army will find that enrollment in the Civilian Conservation Corps for 1 year will pay him $30 per month to start, with fair possibility of advancing to assistant leader at $36 a month or leader at $45 a month. There are 15 assistant leaders and 10 leaders in every camp of 200. Better still, if the young man wishes to enroll in the Navy, he will find that he will be paid $21 a month for the first 4 months, after which he will be promoted to seaman, second class, at $36 a month, and by the end of the first year he will in all likelihood advance to seaman, first class, at $54 per month. In other services such as the Air Corps he will even fare better.

Under the circumstances it is scarcely surprising that enlistment in the Army is not always alluring to men who might otherwise be inclined to join.

Mr. President, it is amazing to me that we can get men at all to enlist in the Army at $21 a month in peacetime, when they can obtain work under the W. P. A. or go on relief, or into C. C. C. camps, and get more money than they would get in the Regular Army. It is amazing that we can get men who have any ambition at all to go into the Army for 3 years under such conditions. We simply have not been fair. If we want an army we ought to pay for it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. What figure would the Senator advocate at which to start them?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Thirty dollars.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am asking the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I am capable of answering.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thought the Senator was.

Mr. WHEELER. I would start them in at $30 a month.

Mr. CONNALLY. How long would the Senator keep them at $30 a month before giving them $40 a month?

Mr. WHEELER. I think there has been some proposed legislation introduced on the subject. I should at least start them on an equality with the man who is in a C. C. C. camp or the man who is on relief.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would the Senator make the C. C. C. men drill and would he train them?

Mr. WHEELER. The C. C. C. men are supposed to work for 8 hours a day.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not ask the Senator that. I asked him if he would give them military training.

Mr. WHEELER. It would not hurt my feelings if they were given military training.

Mr. CONNALLY. How did the Senator vote the other day on that proposition?

Mr. WHEELER. I am not sure whether I voted for or against it. But whether I voted for the proposal or against it would not enter into the matter in the slightest degree. I say that if we notify the C. C. C. men in advance that they are to be given military training, that is one thing, but after they are in, we cannot pass a law saying that they shall be given military training. As a matter of fact, I think it would be a good thing to have the C. C. C. boys given military training. The Senator cannot bring on a fight with me on that point.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is aware that the National Guard is supposed to be called out only in the event of some difficulty, either internal or external. By act of Congress the President is entitled to call out the National Guard before any internal or external difficulty occurs. A great many of the National Guard men are older than those provided to be called under the draft bill; and particularly the first sergeants, and the right and left guides of the companies, and the company clerks are usually married men and of more mature years, as a general rule, than those provided to be called under the limitations contained in the draft bill. When it comes to the question of equality, they are men with families quite often; they are men with dependents, and, of course, their pay in the Army is considerably less than they are making in private life. So, from the standpoint of equality, the men who are taken away from jobs, who have fixed places in the ordinary business of the Nation, would be entitled to first consideration, because when they went into the National Guard it was assumed that they would not be called out except in case of invasion or some internal difficulty within the States, other than for their regular training.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator from Maryland. Let me say that recently I read a speech delivered in 1814 by Daniel Webster, a great constitutional lawyer and statesman. He challenged the constitutionality of conscription and called attention to the particular provisions of the Constitution at that time with reference to the State militia.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I merely made a suggestion. It is now proposed to take the men of the National Guard, because the guard is already in existence; they are to be called out for a long period of time into the service of the Government, when the men themselves, at the time they entered the guard, assumed that they would not be called out for a long period, except when there was an invasion, or when there was some internal trouble. I feel that our first obligation to make some adjustment is to the National Guard, ahead of the men who never have given any service at all in the way of personal preparedness to the defense of their country. The men who are in the National Guard have taken many nights off, and many days off, to become personally prepared, and they certainly, over and above every other class, being volunteers, are entitled to a degree of consideration, which up to now I do not believe they have received.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator.

General Marshall emphasized the problems this situation creates for the Army when he said:

> We have a very difficult problem in recruiting the Army, because our ratings, meaning the numbers in increased pay positions, are much below those of the Navy, and because we have to keep our men on for sometimes 2 or even 3 years in the grade of second-class private, where the base pay is $21. In the other services after 4 months they pass to the next rating, and go to $30.
> We have always been on a very parsimonious basis of pay, and we were fearful of the difficulties we might encounter in this particular recruiting, with the special attraction of the Air Corps, and with the attractions of travel in the Navy, but we have been most successful, and we have secured very fine young men.

At a later point, General Marshall discussed the possibilities of advancement for Army enlisted men, as follows:

> Senator REYNOLDS. The distinction between the pay of $21 and $30—is that automatic, based upon the number of years of service or ability?
>
> General MARSHALL. The advance from $21 to $30 a month is carried by the promotion from private, to private first class. The promotion depends upon the annual appropriations. Each year we have endeavored to have them give us more funds for private first class and certain other ratings, and we have been unsuccessful. So, as I say, we have men who serve an entire enlistment as a private on the basis of $21, because there was no vacancy for them, regardless of how good they might be, in the rating of private first class.
> It does not seem fair to us that our men should be kept for a whole enlistment or more, on the basic pay rate of a private at $21 a month, while in the other services at the end of 4 months they automatically receive a material increase in pay. That affects recruiting and affects morale.
>
> Senator REYNOLDS. Certainly.
>
> General MARSHALL. And the man himself has his own opinion as to the merits of the case.
>
> Senator REYNOLDS. It does not seem quite right.
> General MARSHALL. It puts the War Department in an embarrassing position in that it seems not to recognize what is injustice to the enlisted personnel. * * * They compete for private first class as hard in the Army as they do to be a corporal.

Quite a different story was related by Admiral Nimitz, of the Navy Department. He testified as follows:

> Senator REYNOLDS. You do not experience any difficulty in getting sufficient voluntary enlistments, do you?
>
> Admiral NIMITZ. So far we have not. We have today about 7,000 men on the waiting list waiting to go into training stations.

* * * * * * *

Senator REYNOLDS. Admiral, may I ask you what is the lowest pay of any enlisted man in the Navy?

Admiral NIMITZ. $21 a month.

* * * * * * *

Senator REYNOLDS. For what period of time?

Admiral NIMITZ. Approximately 4 months.

Senator REYNOLDS. And after that?

Admiral NIMITZ. He is promoted to seaman second class and that pay is $36 a month. * * * Usually, because of the great expansion that has taken place, usually he would not have to wait more than a year before he would be promoted to seaman, for which he is paid $54 per month, seaman first class, and promotion in the Navy has been, for enlisted men, has been very good, and is due largely to the fact that we are expanding rapidly.

* * * * * * *

Senator REYNOLDS. I would readily assume from hearing testimony produced before this committee that people more readily volunteer for the Navy than the Army, and I was wondering why that was. Is it due to the fact that the Navy provides opportunity to travel, see the world, increased pay, or extended enlistments? What, in your opinion, induces more men for voluntary service in the Navy than in the Army?

Admiral NIMITZ. I think the pay has something to do with it and I think the prospect of getting about the world a little bit is an added incentive. I would not believe that the extended period of enlistment is an incentive, because I think that would operate just the other way.

It might seem to the ordinary reader of General Marshall's testimony and that of other witnesses who testified for the General Staff that in the light of the avowedly substandard conditions obtaining for enlisted men in the Army, the logical manner of meeting an emergency condition requiring the raising of approximately 400,000 men in a short time would be to remedy the conditions which admittedly act as deterrents to voluntary enlistment—namely, to lower the minimum enlistment period, and to advance salary and promotion opportunities in line at least with those prevailing in the Navy. In connection with the suggestion of shortening the enlistment period I have pointed out that General Shedd replied that the General Staff preferred compulsory service even if it were possible to obtain the men by voluntary enlistment. In like manner, when General Marshall was asked whether or not the emergency need for 400,000 men could be met by increasing the salary of the recruits he did not at all deny the validity of the suggestion, but stated, instead, that this might make a large army, so expensive to carry in times of no emergency that the public might insist on reducing the Army when the emergency is over. This is General Marshall's testimony, quoted at some length in order that the full import may be had:

Senator DOWNEY. Now, I do start, General, with the idea, all things being equal, the man who voluntarily enlists in the Army is a better soldier than the man who is conscripted, other things being equal. I know I would be personally, and I believe most men would be.

Now, what I am wondering is if in justice and fairness to the men in the Regular Army we would not be the gainer if we would increase the compensation paid the private soldier or increase the benefits that he may indirectly derive, and thereby tend to build up voluntary enlistments.

General MARSHALL. I am very glad to hear you say that. So far as the problem of pay rates is concerned, I would say this: For the first enlistment, for the private at the bottom of the scale, I believe that, considering the other things he receives from the Government, the present pay rate is approximately correct; but I think that after that it is not. There are too few privates, first class, and higher ratings. There should be increases considerably above what we have at the present time.

* * * * * * *

If we have an act such as this, I think it will do two things. In the first place, it would establish the Army on a democratic basis, which I believe would produce a degree of solidarity among our people as to the Army, which would be of great advantage to the Army.

It also would permit us in time of peace to maintain a sufficient military force to secure our position without so much of confused discussion as at the present time and without the necessity for colossal expenditures; because to maintain large groups of personnel in the military service is an expensive process, and, of course, the inevitable reaction after the period of crisis is one of economy and of emasculation.

We saw that, for example, in June 1920, when after exhaustive hearings the National Defense Act finally was enacted into law providing for 280,000 men and recruiting was started toward that number, another reaction immediately developed. * * * I think that represents the inevitable reaction. I think it will always happen with us.

So, if our Military Establishment is on the basis of high pay, which it must have for the technical men and particularly for the noncommissioned officers who furnish morale and leadership of our straight combat units, then, if there is not some such measure as this to provide most of the men at much lower cost, the charge will be that the Army costs too much to expect our Government, in its protected situation behind two oceans, to continue to bear the expense in normal times, and so the cycle of unpreparedness repeats itself.

That is the reason why the Army officials have not wanted to build up the Army pay. This testimony makes clear that the unwillingness of some to encourage enlistments by raising the pay of the enlisted men to adequate levels, and their insistence upon procuring the necessary men by conscription is attributable not to any doubt that the Army could thereby meet the present emergency but to the fear that after the emergency is over the public would not be willing to continue an unnecessarily large Army. The General Staff, in sum, therefore refuses to confine itself to meeting the present emergency; it seeks to meet emergencies to come after the present one is over. The public has been frightened into believing that the present emergency is crucial and must be met. It is even willing to consider shouldering the burden of compulsory conscription if such is the only way national defense can be assured. But the public is most certainly not willing to have conscription imposed under the guise of meeting a present emergency when its true purpose is to make possible maintenance of a large military establishment after the emergency is over. Yet such is the clearly expressed purpose of the General Staff in urging conscription at the present time.

That increased pay would result in greatly increased enlistment in the Army cannot be doubted; reference to a few figures based on the 1930 census will render this concrete.

The total number of unmarried men between the ages of 21 and 45 is 7,750,000. Estimating the present Army base pay of $21 to be the equivalent of $51 per month for a civilian—allowing $30 per month for maintenance—the number of unmarried men between the ages of 21 and 45 with incomes not in excess of this amount is found to be 2,635,000. Incidentally, these income figures for unmarried men are derived from a study by the National Resources Committee entitled "Consumer Incomes in the United States—1938." It is largely to this earning group that enlistments must be deemed confined at the present time, since it cannot be expected that individuals with higher incomes will be interested in enlistment at a reduction from their present pay.

That is the reason why more enlistments come from the Middle West and less from the great industrial sections of the East. With the high pay in industrial sections, enlistments are not so numerous. Enlistments are more numerous in the South, in the Southwest, and in the West, where the income of the farming class in the rural communities is much lower.

If, however, Army base pay were increased $10 per month to $31, making a full income of $61, allowing $30 for maintenance, the number of unmarried men whose income is less would be increased to 3,300,000, an increase of approximately 25 percent. If base pay were further increased to $41, the number of prospective recruits would again be increased to 3,950,000, a further increase of approximately 25 percent. Increasing the base pay to $51 would broaden the field of potential recruits to 4,520,000, a further increase of approximately 25 percent, or a total increase of 75 percent from the lowest figure.

In view of the fact that the Army's quota of enlistments is being exceeded even under the present pay levels, thus evidencing a favorable public response to the requirements of defense, who would venture to deny that increasing the pay levels along the lines indicated, thus broadening the field of potential recruits by approximately 2,000,000 men, would result in quickly obtaining for the Army by enlistments the additional 415,000 men which the General Staff desires?

But, it will be asked, what about the expense of such a program? The answer is: It will save the Government money. Assuming an Army and National Guard of 900,000, increasing the pay of every man to the highest figure above mentioned—that is, to $51 per month—would produce a total increase of $27,000,000 per month, or $324,000,000 dollars per annum. At a time when Congress has passed defense bills which will require an expenditure of $18,000,000,000, according to the Senate committee hearings, $320,000,000 a year does not loom very large. Moreover, the program of compulsory service and training which the General Staff is advocating would cost, according to the Staff's own estimate, a billion dollars per year. If the defense needs of the present emergency in increased Army manpower can be met by the expenditure of $320,000,000, can there be any justification for an expenditure more than three times that amount?

What about those who have been howling about balancing the Budget? When we talked to the Congress of the United States about putting people on relief, giving hungry women and children in this country something out of the Treasury of the United States, and giving the farmers benefit payments—which even Mr. Willkie has recently endorsed—when we talked about doing some of these things, some said, "You will wreck the Government. Why do you not balance the Budget?" Every little chamber of commerce from one end of the country to the other, and every great newspaper in the country was clamoring, "Why do you not balance the Budget?" I wish to call the roll. When we wanted to feed the poor, help the farmer, and do something for the underprivileged every single one of such newspapers was crying for balancing the Budget. They said, "Balance the Budget or you will wreck the country." Now every single one of those great newspapers, and every single one of the great economic royalists who has been clamoring about balancing the Budget, has forgotten about it and thrown it out the window. They say, "Let us set up a Military Establishment in the United States." Why? Not for national defense. No—let us be frank about it—that is not the reason. The reason is that they want to impose upon our country a militarism the like of which is not to be found in any democratic country in the world. It is found only under Mr. Hitler in Germany, Mr. Mussolini in Italy, and Mr. Stalin in Russia.

Those who have any intelligence at all know what is back of the bill. I have mentioned the $18,000,000,000 which we recently appropriated for increased armaments. I was one of those who voted for those bills, because I was impressed by the arguments which were made.

One of the arguments was, "What good are our men without arms?" Now the Military Affairs Committee turns around and in recommending the bill says, "What good are arms without men?" First the argument was, "What good are men without arms?" Now it is, "What good are arms without men?"

What sort of circular reasoning is that? What sort of strange sophistry are we being subjected to?

First we are begged to give arms to our men, then men to our arms. I say to the Military Affairs Committee that for the arms we have voted, we have men waiting aplenty. If they do not believe me, let them read the accounts of the current First Army maneuvers in New York; let them see the pictures of men drilling with pipes instead of guns, with trucks instead of tanks, with birds instead of planes. There are men for our arms. When they are fully equipped in every particular, when supplies of arms and planes wait, then it will be time to talk of new men. By that time, it may very well be, there will be no need to talk of new men. I for one do not think we are settling down to a perpetual crisis unless it be one that we ourselves create by our own hysteria and our own imaginations.

I believe that the statements and figures I have cited amply disprove the first and major contention of the proponents of conscription—that only by conscription can the men needed to meet the demands of national defense be secured.

It is significant to note that the original Burke-Wadsworth bill contained in the preamble the statement that "Experience has shown that such forces (as are needed) cannot be obtained by voluntary service," but that this statement has disappeared from the revised bill reported by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. It was at the suggestion of the General Staff that this sentence was eliminated and the fact is, as the General Staff well knows, experience has shown quite otherwise.

Who drafted the bill? Not the General Staff, but, admittedly, a group of lawyers, a group of superpatriots in the city of New York, who wanted to impose some Wall Street lawyers' ideas, drafted the bill. They said:

> Experience has shown that such forces (as are needed) cannot be obtained by voluntary service.

IS CONSCRIPTION THE METHOD OF RAISING MEN MOST CONSONANT WITH A DEMOCRATIC FORM OF GOVERNMENT?—CONSCRIPTION AS THE EPITOME OF DEMOCRACY

Typical of the justifications on various ethical grounds advanced by the advocates of conscription is the statement of General Shedd I have previously quoted that—

> Regardless of whether we can procure the men by voluntary enlistments or not, the principles of selective service are so fair, so just, and so democratic * * * they spread the requirements of military service over the entire personnel of the country in such a just and proper way * * * that those reasons are so compelling, we should adopt selective service even if we could fill our requirements by voluntary enlistments.

At first their argument was that they could not fill their requirements by voluntary enlistment. When they found they could fill them, then they said, "We want conscription anyway."

At the outset, these resonant references to the principles of democracy underlying conscription evoke a feeling of wonder that an institution which is alleged to constitute the epitome of the democratic concept is at the same time the chief hallmark of all those foreign political regimes from which democracy has been completely and shamelessly banished. I wish somebody would answer that. Conscription is the hallmark of every one of the countries from which democracy has been banished, and here we are following in Hitler's footsteps. Where is conscription found in its fullest flower, where is it ennobled and glorified as the highest honor of the citizen, if not in those lands where militarism and totalitarianism have blanketed the populace, and stifled democracy, most completely?

The truth of the matter is that those who proclaim the democracy of conscription are confusing necessity with choice—what must be, with what should be.

Every nation must defend itself from invasion. That is the universal law of self-preservation. Every inhabitant of a land must be ready to contribute to its defense, even to laying down his life if need be. That is a proposition inherent in the law of self-preservation, it expresses itself neither more nor less in a democratic land than in any other. It is nationalism rather than democracy, but no one would venture for a moment to dispute its validity or application.

To say, however, that every resident of a country must be prepared to defend the country from invasion, even at the cost of his life if need be, is something very different from the proposition that if there be no need, some of our citizens ought to be compelled to spend part of their lives in training for defense, when men are available who are perfectly willing to make a career of this work.

To use a homely illustration, no one can doubt that keeping the streets of our cities clean, free from pestilential and disease-breeding dirt, and open to traffic and commerce is a matter of the most immediate and vital concern to the inhabitants of every city and to the State. No one would dispute, either, that if some unforeseeable emergency arose in connection with the streets, every citizen in the city or State affected would be commanded to go out into the streets to clean them, if necessary, in order to safeguard the public welfare. It would not be denied, furthermore, that if street cleaners were not available to perform their duties day in and day out, the State would have the power to conscript various of the inhabitants to perform these vital services without which the State could not properly function. Yet, because this obligation is inherent in citizenship, no one has come forward to advocate that it is undemocratic to permit our streets to be cleaned by a special class of persons who are willing to make this their work, that street cleaning should be performed by citizens conscripted for such purpose.

To some of us street cleaning would be highly obnoxious; others find it a less objectionable occupation than many other means of gaining a livelihood. So long as men are available and willing to do the work, whatever may be thought about the economic inequities which require some men to clean streets, it has never been regarded as violative of democracy that the task should not be imposed on each group of citizens in turn.

What has been said of street cleaning is, of course, equally applicable to the occupations of firemen, policemen, transport workers, and the like. The performance of all these tasks is vital to the functioning of our society and the welfare of our Nation; in the absence of volunteers they would fall upon the general body of citizenry; but we have never found it necessary, on democratic grounds, to require every citizen to spend a year of his life at them.

The democracy which we hail in our country, and which we all seek jealously to guard, no doubt means different things to different people; but it is certain that to every one of us democracy means at least the right to choose freely our own occupations and to conduct our lives with the greatest amount of freedom consistent with the general welfare. We recognize that when the defense of the Nation and the public weal are concerned, the rights of the individual must yield. But conversely, we believe that if the public necessity does not so require, the essence of democracy is to leave the individual unmolested in the enjoyment, in the words of a declaration promulgated by great Americans, of "the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Those who think and speak as General Shedd does seek to alienate at the present time in the name of democracy the very rights which the framers of the Declaration of Independence pronounced "inalienable." It is believed that the American public still holds to the democratic concepts expressed by Jefferson and his colleagues, rather than to those of the proponents of conscription in peacetime.

Mr. President, what is perhaps the most paradoxical aspect of the discussion now taking place on this subject is to find many of those who for the last 7 years have raged about the "tyranny" of our Government in enacting legislation governing the wages and hours of labor in factories, the processes of collective bargaining between employer and employee, and the like, to find those who have cried to the skies against the regimentation by big Government, now speaking up in behalf of the democracy of conscription whether or not it is necessary. It does, indeed, seem strange that compelling men to leave their work and their homes to enter the Army on pain of imprisonment if they resist—when there is admittedly no necessity therefor—is democratic, whereas requiring an employer to pay his workers more than 25 cents an hour is tyranny and regimentation.

Where now is all the talk about regimentation, about taking men from 21 to 31 when it is not necessary, according to the Army itself, in order to fill up the Army quota and make up their defense program? That is not somebody's idle statement, but the testimony before the committee of General Shedd and General Marshall. What is that but regimentation of the same sort and the same kind that Mr. Hitler and Mr. Mussolini and Mr. Stalin have practiced in Europe?

Certainly to many millions of Americans it will seem that if conscription in peacetime, and in the absence of the needs of national defense, is democracy, then democracy has reached its fullest flowering in lands across the waters which surround us—in Japan, in Germany, in Italy, in Russia.

DOES CONSCRIPTION FALL EQUALLY ON ALL CLASSES?

Many sincere persons who view conscription with mistrust and dislike nevertheless withhold their opposition on the ground that "it does not seem right that only the jobless and the low-paid worker should be obliged to join the army"; and General Shedd probably referred to this aspect of the question when he said:

> They (the principles of conscription) spread the requirements of military service over the entire personnel in such a just and proper way. * * *"

In almost the next breath, however, General Shedd explained that if we had the compulsory selective service recommended by the General Staff, it would be designed to select the "unimportant" men, while the important ones would not be inducted into the Army.

I have already quoted General Shedd's statement, but I repeat it here so that its significance may be had:

> General SHEDD. Well, I believe it (voluntary enlistment) would tend more to disrupt the country because you cannot pick and choose the unimportant man. I do not mean unimportant from his point of view, but unimportant in the whole economic life of our country. We have got these factors, we have to produce certain things.
>
> Senator REYNOLDS. But if this man volunteered, it is a different proposition. Suppose you forced him——
> General SHEDD. We would not force him. We would not take him.

The press reported that one of the reporters who was present when this testimony was given later asked the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, whether this process of selection as described by General Shedd would not in fact operate to draft those who were unemployed, while exempting those with jobs, to which the Senator from Texas is said to have responded, "There are unemployed among the rich, too."

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I do not recall having made any such reply as that.

Mr. WHEELER. It was quoted in the press. The Senator may not have said it. Many times we are quoted in a certain way in the press when we have not said what is attributed to us.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I say, I do not recall saying it.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand.

This is true; but the difference is that the rich man is unemployed by choice, not necessity. When the time comes for him to have a job, then, willy-nilly, a job awaits him. "Junior" becomes a director of this company, a fifth vice president of that one; and who can then dispute that he is an "important" man in the economic life of our country? But no one will urge that the unemployed man, the unskilled man getting ten, twenty, or thirty dollars per week or less, is so important that he cannot be made to serve; and it is he who will serve.

During the last war, after Congress had enacted the Selective Service Act in May 1917, it also passed a resolution classifying persons with respect to deferments and priorities; that is, stating what categories of men would be chosen first and what classes would be deferred.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. I should like to say to the Senator at that point, if I may, that, of course, he must realize that under any circumstances, by the selective-service plan or the voluntary plan, most of the Army, the overwhelming majority of it, will be from the so-called nonwealthy class, because 80 or 90 percent of the people are in the nonwealthy class or the poorer class.

Mr. WHEELER. That is true; but what I am saying is that it is asserted that selective service is the democratic method, because it will bear in the same way on all persons. That certainly is not true.

Let me proceed. It is interesting to note that in class I those to be called first were married men who had habitually failed to support their families, married men dependent on wives for support, unskilled farm laborers, unskilled industrial laborers.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. The Senator, of course, might go on and say that there were ever so many other kinds of men, professional men and otherwise, who were also in that class.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes; certainly; but I am talking about the proposition of it being democratic now.

These, then, are the unimportant men who will be immediately inducted into service under a conscription bill. Henry Ford's son is obviously "important" to business; he must prepare to take over his father's place. Mrs. Jones' son, an unemployed worker, is important only to the Army. It is to Mrs. Jones' son that the Army looks for recruits now, and it will be to him it will turn for conscription. The only question is, Shall young Jones be induced to join the Army voluntarily by offering him a decent rate of pay and a fair chance of promotion, or shall he be forced to join the Army at $21 a month whether he likes it or not? If there is any doubt about what the answer is, just ask young Jones.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. How will the Senator get into the Army anybody who does not want to go in under the volunteer system? He will not get Mr. Ford's son. He will not get the widow Jones's son, to whom reference has been made.

Mr. WHEELER. That is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. How will they be gotten into the Army when they do not want to go in—the rich man's son or anybody else's son—under the volunteer system?

Mr. WHEELER. They will not go in.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then, the Senator does not want them in?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly; but they will not go in under the conscription which some persons are howling about and saying is so democratic.

Mr. CONNALLY. We will have a chance to get them into the Army under our plan, but under the Senator's plan there will not be a chance to get them in at all.

Mr. WHEELER. After all, as I pointed out, the difference is this: In a democracy a citizen undertakes to follow the profession he wants to follow. Some men like to follow the Army as a profession; some men like to be policemen; some men like to be in the fire department. It is a great thing in the eyes of some men to be able to wear a uniform, and they love to wear the uniform of a policeman or a fireman. To other persons it is a detestable occupation. They do not want to follow it; they cannot bear it; they cannot tolerate it. Some men want to be lawyers. Some men want to be doctors.

Why should we say to everybody, "You have to be a doctor"? Why should we say, under a democratic form of government, "Everybody has to be a lawyer"? Why should we say, "Everybody has to be a policeman, whether he wants to be or not"? Why should we say, "Everybody has to be a street cleaner"? Why should we say, "Everybody has to be in the Army," unless the exigencies of the time demand it? Of course, when war is declared by the Congress of the United States, everybody must take part, willy-nilly, in the defense of his country, because that is part of the inherent principle of self-defense.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BURKE. Is there not a difference between the condition the Senator is pointing out, of those who want to be professional soldiers and go in the Army because they like it, and this proposal, which would merely say to men, it is true whether they like it or not, "You have been selected, and you are one of those who must receive training, so that if the emergency arises your country can call upon you to render service"? Is there not a real distinction between building up a Regular Army and training the great mass of the citizens?

Mr. WHEELER. Not at all. What does General Shedd say about that? He is talking about conscription in the Army. He is not talking about training men. He says that regardless of whether or not we have voluntary enlistments he desires conscription. He says, "I want conscription. I want to be able to take you, John Doe, from your bank, I want to take you from your business, I want to take you from your law practice, I want to take you from your medical profession, regardless of whether we are in time of peace or not, and put you in the Army, and say you must have a year's training." I say to you that that is undemocratic. I say that it is against the traditions of American institutions. It is the very system which has been adopted in Italy, in Germany, and in Russia. It is the very system from which my forefathers, and I will venture to assert the forefathers of the Senator from Nebraska, left European shores and came to this country to escape.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. I think very possibly my forefathers and the forefathers of the Senator from Montana left Europe about the same time and came here because they did not believe in a large standing army.

Mr. WHEELER. That is true.

Mr. BURKE. They did not believe in militarism.

Mr. WHEELER. They did not want to be conscripted.

(Manifestations of applause in the galleries.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRUMAN in the chair). The occupants of the galleries are warned that manifestations of approval or disapproval are a violation of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BURKE. I will not speak for the forefathers of the Senator from Montana, but I will say in reference to mine that I hope they were ready at all times to submit themselves to the necessary training. They did not want anything to do with the Regular Army, but they wanted to be ready, so that if their country needed them in its time of peril they could render a good account of themselves; and that is all this bill does.

Mr. WHEELER. I cannot go back and speak for my ancestors. I have never wanted to go back too far, because I was afraid of what I might find there. Somebody on the floor of the Senate might say that possibly a hundred years ago, instead of the name of some one of my ancestors being Wheeler or Fay, it was Fahy, or something else. [Laughter.]

THE BURKE-WADSWORTH BILL—SOME OBSERVATIONS

I shall not attempt to make an exhaustive analysis of the Burke-Wadsworth bill in the form approved by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, but merely to present a few pertinent observations.

First. Under the original Burke-Wadsworth bill, all men between the ages of 18 and 65 were required to register, although during the World War only men up to 45 years of age were registered. To meet the needs of national defense in peacetime, an attempt was made to register 13,000,000 more men than was found necessary when we were actually at war, and had to send a gigantic expeditionary force to Europe.

Second. Although under the original Burke-Wadsworth bill men up to 45 were liable to be inducted into the Army and Navy, and the bill actually required that 3 to 7 percent of the total number of men chosen must be between 37 and 45 years of age, yet at the present time the Army refuses to accept for voluntary enlistment men over the age of 35. Thus, as in the case of 1-year service periods, the bill paradoxically sought to compel, on pain of severe penalty, what men are not now permitted to do voluntarily. Although the pending bill does make an obeisance in the direction of voluntary service, it reduces this to absurdity by coupling it with conscription. Men are to be permitted to enlist, but on the threat that if they do not, they will be conscripted. This makes a mockery of the word "voluntary."

Certainly if a robber holds a gun at my head and says, "You can dig up your pocketbook or else—" I will dig up my pocketbook, but not voluntarily.

Third. The revised bill reported out by the Military Affairs Committee has shifted to the 21 to 31 age group the requirement to register, which, it is estimated, will directly affect some 12,000,000 men. But it must be remembered that this is not a fixed limit. Of those who pass above the 31-year limit, approximately a million each year will be called for service, and will then remain in a reserve corps for 10 years additional.

Fourth. The number of men who can be inducted into service is within the unrestricted discretion of the President, subject only to the proviso that the President shall have no authority to induct men until Congress appropriates the funds necessary for such purpose. This places 12,000,000 men at the beck and call of the President immediately, whenever Congress appropriates the money.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. There are two uncertainties there. First, there is the lodgment of the right of decision in the President as to the number of men who shall be inducted, and then there is the limitation that only that number may be inducted for which Congress makes appropriation, and no human being knows what a subsequent Congress will do.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree entirely with the Senator. Not only that, but 12,000,000 men will be registered, and a club will be held over them. They will be told, "You may be called or you may not be called at any time, depending upon the whim of the Congress of the United States and the President of the United States."

Mr. VANDENBERG. Furthermore, there is not a young man from 21 to 31 years of age who will be able to make a plan for his life, from the moment the law is enacted.

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly; he will not be able to make a plan for his life; he will not be able to marry because he must realize that he may be inducted into the Army tomorrow, and he will not be able to take a job. I venture the assertion that if the bill shall be enacted one who is registered will find it difficult to find a job, because employers will say, "You may be called under the provisions of the law tomorrow, and tomorrow you may have to go into the Army."

Fifth. Although the bill purports to be designed to meet a current defense emergency, it will remain in operation for 5 years, and it provides that men who have completed their service shall remain in a reserve corps for 10 years thereafter, with the obligation to engage in "refresher" periods of training. The effects of the bill, therefore, will not cease to operate for 15 years from the time of its adoption.

Sixth. Although the training period is set at 1 year, subject to "refresher" periods during the following 10 years, it is provided that the trainee may be kept in service for an unlimited period longer than 1 year if Congress provides that the national interest is imperiled. I would say that the trainee will have to serve for longer than a year, if the hysteria now sweeping over the country shall continue.

Seventh. No provision is made to ensure civilian control of the local draft boards, and the decisions of these boards are made final except where an appeal is authorized in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

Eighth. Although the bill purports merely to provide military training for men during peacetime, from the time a man is called and so instructed he is subject to Army law, including all the rigorous provisions of courts martial designed to govern an army engaged in war. Under these provisions trainees guilty of the slightest offense, whether it concerns the Army or merely civilian matters, are subject to the vigorous procedure of courts martial, in which neither offense nor procedure is defined, and sentences are within the sole discretion of the court martial, without appeal, except in the case of death.

Ninth. Although the bill makes a gesture in the direction of protecting a trainee's job, the provision as drafted provides a facile "out" for the employer, setting up the claim of "changed circumstances" or "unreasonableness." Let me ask, If an employer is faced with the prospect of reinstating an active union man, will he ever consider it anything but unreasonable to do so? Will he not have a dozen reasons why it is unreasonable without mentioning the real one? Even the majority leader, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], openly conceded here last week that—

> I doubt very much whether it (the reemployment clause) could have any legal effect * * * it would not be a frank statement to say or to hold out the hope to all of them that that can be done.

Yet the press and many Congressmen who do not possess the candor of the majority leader do not hesitate to promise blindly that this clause will guarantee conscripts the return of their jobs. When men are marching off to war many of them were promised that they would have their jobs back, but when they returned they did not get them.

In addition, by making the employee's right to reinstatement dependent upon his securing a certificate from his superior officers certifying that "in their judgment" he has "satisfactorily fulfilled his duties of training and service" the bill places it in the power of the officers in effect to blacklist a trainee's return to civilian life. Not only does it make his return to work at his former job in the civilian world dependent upon his having been a satisfactory soldier, but it places him at the mercy of any spiteful or vengeful superior officer.

Tenth. The General Staff estimates that the cost of registering and classifying 1,000,000 men will be $25,000,000, or $25 per man. At the same rate, to register and classify the 12,000,000 men would cost $300,000,000; even if the cost can be reduced to $10 per man it will amount to $120,000,000.

Eleventh. The General Staff estimates that the cost of training the men under this bill will be $1,000,000,000 per annum.

Where are my friends who want the Budget balanced? Where are some of the newspapers which have been shouting about balancing the Budget, but are shouting now that we spend a billion dollars a year for training these men? Why have they changed? Why do they want to regiment 12,000,000 men in the United States?

WHY DOES THE GENERAL STAFF URGE CONSCRIPTION?—IS CONSCRIPTION SOMETHING NEW IN THE ARMY'S PLANS?

It is a natural question to ask, as many persons do: "If conscription is not needed to obtain the men necessary for national defense, if it will, in fact, produce merely a huge mass of half-baked conscripts totally incompetent for modern warfare, why, then, does the General Staff urge this measure upon the country?"

To begin with, it must be asked in reply—and without in any way aspersing the fundamental sincerity of our Staff—"Is there a general staff in any country in the world which does not, and has not always, favored conscription and compulsory military training?"

When I say that, I am not casting aspersions upon the General Staff. As was stated yesterday, I think by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], when a man graduates from a military school, spends his life in the Army or the Navy, and grows up in that environment, it is almost impossible for him to believe otherwise than that the greatest thing in the world is for the youth of the country to have military training. Unconsciously he will entertain that belief because of his environment. Whether we realize it or not, our day-to-day environment forms and colors our opinions.

It is believed that history compels a negative answer to the query. There is nothing strange in this fact, for general staffs everywhere are confronted with like problems in the maintenance of armies, and share a similar outlook with respect to the place of the military in the state. For the last two decades the points of view of the various general staffs throughout the world have been in the ascendancy. To such a point is this true that in nations such as Japan, Italy, Germany, and Russia the line of demarcation between the general staff and the government itself is at times almost indistinguishable.

I do not wonder that it was stated here this morning that our General Staff had consulted with the general staff in England. The Senator making the statement should have added that they consulted with the general staff in Germany, and probably with the general staff in Italy and Russia, and every other country in the world, and that they all came to the conclusion that there should be compulsory military training and conscription for the United States of America.

Those who think that the present advocacy of conscription by our own General Staff has been precipitated by the sudden crisis in world affairs, and that it is aimed merely at this crisis, are unfortunately mistaken.

Our General Staff has been urging some system of compulsory training or conscription ever since the last war. In 1920, at a time when the bones of the dead on the battlefields had not yet been gathered up, a conscription bill was presented to Congress and actually passed the Senate, but failed of passage in the House. There was successfully put through Congress, however, an act called the National Defense Act of 1920. In that act the General Staff was authorized—

> To prepare plans for national defense and the use of the military forces for that purpose * * * and for the mobilization of the manhood of the Nation and its material resources in an emergency.

On the authority of this provision, the General Staff has a committee of 95 officers who have continuously been planning for conscription and mobilization of the manpower of this Nation for the last 14 years. Here is the testimony of Major Hershey, of the General Staff, who is the executive of the Joint Army and Navy Selective Service Committee.

> Major HERSHEY. * * * For the last 14 years—the committee was formed in 1926—it has been the responsibility of this committee to plan an organization to initiate and to operate personnel procurement if the necessity should arise and Congress should declare the time has arrived to put it into operation. It has been the business of this committee to make the plans to operate the system.
> The CHAIRMAN (Senator SHEPPARD). So, if this bill is passed, by the work of your committee the machinery is now ready?
>
> Major HERSHEY. That is right, sir.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. I think that is a fine showing.
> Major HERSHEY. I will pursue just a little more some of the details of it, because I think it is something that goes back in each of our home States.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. I think this is a fine tribute to the foresight and the patriotism of the War Department, Major.
>
> Major HERSHEY. I think it is also a tribute to the foresight of the Congress, sir, in 1920, when they resolved that never again should we be in the situation we were in 1917.
> The CHAIRMAN. Congress defeated the bill in 1920 (the reference is to the conscription bill which passed the Senate but was defeated in the House), but the War Department carried out the idea and you gentlemen continued to study and have the machinery ready for it, which is very commendable.
>
> Major HERSHEY. We are very proud to have you say that, sir. Before 1926 there was planning done under the 1920 act, but it was done by conference between the War and Navy Departments, but in 1926, by the exchange of letters, a committee was established whose permanent job should be the development of these plans. * * *
> In 1926 the committee started to develop, first, policies; second, plans, regulations to put some policies into effect should they ever become law by Congress; plans to organize a National Guard headquarters. Very soon it became apparent to those people that no matter what we had in plans, the plans walk on the legs of men, and that men must be provided who permanently would be assigned to this work. So the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy assigned to this job a total of 95 officers. * * * This is the nucleus that has worked through the years to perfect the plans in the national field and to furnish the system. * * * And I should like to say at this time that the wording of this bill, so far as the organizations go, so far as setting up the machinery goes, is identical with the part that has been in the plans for an emergency throughout the years.

So whether the men are needed for the purpose of this emergency, the departments were planning to strike at the time when they could put across conscription. Now, when people are seeing airplanes flying over the Rocky Mountains, when they are seeing submarines on the coasts, and are thinking about being bombed, is the time to strike to put permanent military conscription upon the people of the United States of America.

Yesterday reference was made to what the Gallup poll showed. I know that the Gallup poll is wrong so far as Montana is concerned, because I have received letters from almost every single community in that State. If anyone believes that conscription is popular in the United States and that it can be put across, I challenge him to go to the country with that proposal. I should like to see a referendum on the subject. I should like on the public platform to argue the matter with the General Staff. I should like to have the lawyers in New York who have furthered this measure come to Montana and tell the farmers, the workers, and the mothers, and the other people there what a fine thing it would be to have conscription for their boys. The people of Montana not only would not listen to them but the lawyers would be lucky to get out of the State. [Laughter.]

I should like to have anyone else come into my State and argue that question. I wish to say that I am a candidate for Senator this year, and I should like to have someone come to my State and make this question an issue against me in the fall election. I should welcome having anyone come there and raise this question. I should also like to go into the State of any other Senator who thinks conscription is popular in his State and who would like to challenge me to come into his State and argue the question with him.

I challenge any Senator who thinks conscription is popular with the American people to come into my State and debate the question with me; and if he is a candidate for reelection, to give me the chance to come into his State and debate the question with him in his State. I venture the assertion that any candidate for the Senate will be defeated if that issue is made against him; and I will make the issue if any Senator will tell me that he would like to have the issue raised.

It is thus seen that this bill, which purports to have emanated from a group of business and professional men called the Citizens' Military Camp Association, and to have been newly framed to meet the unforeseeable crisis which has come upon us, actually is the result of increasing planning for 14 years by a General Staff committee of 95 Army and Navy officers. Whatever light this fact may cast upon the spontaneity of the present drive for conscription, no one can challenge the foresightedness of a General Staff which in 1926, when the world was completely at peace and Adolf Hitler unheard of outside of Germany, could foresee the present emergency.

WHY THE GENERAL STAFF IS PUSHING CONSCRIPTION NOW

To comprehend adequately why the staff is trying to push this legislation through Congress at the present time, and exactly what benefits it hopes to derive from it, reference must be made to a portion of General Marshall's testimony, previously quoted. It will be recalled that General Marshall testified:

> If we have an act such as this, I think it will do two things. In the first place it would establish the Army on a democratic basis, which I believe would produce a degree of solidarity among our people as to the Army, which would be of great advantage to the Army.
> It also would permit us in time of peace to maintain a sufficient force to secure our position without so much of confused discussion as at the present time, and without the necessity for collossal expenditures, because to maintain large groups of personnel in the military service is an expensive process, and, of course, the inevitable reaction after the period of crisis is one of economy and emasculation.

This statement of General Marshall's merits the most careful study, because it embodies the very pith of the answer as to why the staff seeks conscription. The answer is:

First. Conscription would produce a degree of solidarity among our people as to the Army which would be of great advantage to the Army. What does this mean? It means that through conscription, through causing all the men in the country to register and large numbers to enter the Army, to make the country, in short, military-minded, the country will be imbued with a greater respect for the Army; that the Army will gain great prestige, which would be a great advantage—to whom? Not to the country but to the Army.

Second. Conscription will enable the General Staff in peacetime, when the present crisis has been resolved, to maintain a large standing army, "without so much of confused discussion as at the present time," and without running afoul of the demand for economy.

Once again it is clear that the General Staff's desire for conscription is not based on the needs of the present crisis but on utilizing the present crisis to saddle conscription on the country in order that it can maintain a large standing army in peacetime, without so much confused discussion, and in order to heighten the prestige of the Army with the public, to make the public military minded, and to line it up behind the Army on solidarity with it.

I am not criticizing the Army when I say these things. I say it is only human nature for them to take that position, because of their environment, and I would do it if I had been in the same environment and in the Army. I make these statements not in criticism of the Army or of the Navy, but they are true, nevertheless.

Substantiation of these conclusions from General Marshall's testimony may be found in that of Major Hershey, also of the General Staff. Senator REYNOLDS pressed Major Hershey as to whether it would not be wise to fingerprint all men at the time they were required to register. Major Hershey replied:

I would not prefer it at this time, because I do not have the information at my fingertips, but I do not happen to be thinking of the Army at this time; I am thinking about that civilian organization that furnishes people for the Army. We do not want to discourage them from registration—we want everybody to register—and there are certain individuals in this ccuntry that are willing to register, but they do not care just now to put down their fingerprints, and they stay away from registration. They say, "I am willing to register for service, but I cannot afford to put my fingerprints down." And he stays away and you have got a slacker, which is bad medicine from the standpoint of morale for we want everybody to go and register, because that is one of the things that is going to make our people think that everybody is behind this thing; and we do not want to put a solitary straw in the way of everybody getting this card, because we want everybody to do it. After we get these names, then we can start other things, but we must at first keep things simple. * * *

Of course, we ought to start out and register them, and then call them, and then fingerprint them, and then kick them around.

Despite this illuminating exposition by Major Hershey, General Reckord, of the National Guard, had a little difficulty grasping the idea. He testified:

General RECKORD. My only quarrel with it (the bill), if it may be termed that—that perhaps is not a proper word, but my thought is that the proponents of this bill have taken a much larger bite than was necessary at this time. * * * It may be a good thing to get all these people registered, but it does seem to me that it is unnecessary to register 40,000,000 men when you need less than 2,000,000.

Senator REYNOLDS. As a matter of fact, it has been testified here by several individuals that more than the number we would need for this limited emergency, for the training purposes under the bill, can be procured from the classification from 21 to 31; so why register those from 31 to 65?

Perhaps the Senator from Nebraska can tell us; but I have not been able to judge.

Continuing with the testimony of General Reckord:

General RECKORD. I think the proponents of the bill had another reason, if you want my honest opinion. I think that by registering all of the men we will make all the people of this Nation come to a realization of the world situation confronting us. I cannot understand why they used those figures unless they had something like that in mind.

What do they want to do? Do they want to scare the people?

Secretary Stimson expressed the same thought.

Conscription is necessary—

He says—

to impress upon the country the gravity of the world situation. (New York Times, July 3, p. 1.)

For Secretary Stimson and the General Staff, it is not enough that the American people should arrive at its judgment of the world situation on the basis of free, open, and rational consideration of the situation. It must be stampeded into a militaristic frame of mind, and made ready for any adventures the Secretary has in mind.

Government by persuasion—

Said Stimson—

is very much slower than government by arbitrary force. (New York Times, August 1, p. 13.)

So the Secretary is attempting by this bill to remedy this disadvantage by giving us "government by arbitrary force." There are, however, still a few of us who believe that "government by persuasion" has virtues for which increased speed cannot compensate. Perhaps Mussolini made the trains run on time, but the Italian people are now paying the price in tears and blood after having completely jettisoned their liberty.

I have been talking about the reasons why the General Staff wants conscription. I now ask, Why do men of the stamp of Stimson and other high administration men urge it upon us? I am afraid that only the future will reveal this to us; but I say now that it is not because they believe our shores or our skies are in danger of invasion. For these men there is an entire hemisphere to be defended; and if Argentina or Brazil does not wish voluntarily to be defended, then must we not take them into protective custody? In short, are not these administration men counting upon our invading large parts of South America—Mexico, perhaps—all in the name of defending our country?

When men begin to envisage the defense of their country in terms of an entire hemisphere, then, of course, millions upon millions of men are necessary. It was in the name of defense of Germany that Hitler invaded Czechoslovakia, Poland, Belgium, Holland, and Norway. In the name of defense Russia invaded little Finland. I ask Secretary Stimson, in the name of defense, to what corners of the world does he intend to send the millions of men he seeks to conscript, when the Army and all expert military authority agree that only 400,000 additional men are required for ample national defense?

Oh, Mr. President, how many times have I heard Senators rise on the floor of the Senate and say that for our own defense we must go into South America? Why is Stalin taking a part of Rumania? Why has he taken the Baltic States? In the name of defense. Why is Germany doing all the things she is doing? In the name of defense. God save America from that kind of philosophy.

WHAT SORT OF SOCIETY WILL THE ARMY GIVE US?

It has been pointed out that, although the Burke-Wadsworth bill will remain in full force for only 5 years, its provisions will carry on for 15 years, by virtue of the fact that all trainees will be placed in a reserve corps for a 10-year period and will be called back for refresher training during that 10-year period. According to General Staff estimates, approximately 800,000 to 1,000,000 men will be trained each year, making a total of four or five million during the 5-year period. There is nothing in the bill, however, which limits the number to that stated by the General Staff, the question being one which is wholly within the unfettered discretion of the President. Some 12,000,000 men are required to register and hold themselves ready for call.

Thus, there can be no question that the bill profoundly affects the entire manhood of the Nation and every home in it. The Army influence is about to be extended throughout the length and breadth of our land, to permeate almost every person in the Nation. Such, as has been shown, is the expressed intendment of the proponents of this measure.

Of what nature will this colossal influence be which is about to sweep through our Nation from end to end?

The answer is not, unfortunately, difficult to discover. What has been the nature of this influence in every country in the world where the military has become dominant? It cannot be otherwise here. We are no different from the people of Germany, the people of Italy, and the people of other countries where militarism has become the dominant factor.

The nature of the military concept of society is, after all, a simple and natural one. For the military the one thing which counts most is order and discipline. An Army man is interested predominantly in getting results quickly and effectively. Whatever militates against effectiveness must be obviated. If people are to be permitted to stop and ask questions, to engage in debates as "confused discussions," as General Marshall puts it, then loss of time and inefficiency will result. People must learn to do as they are told, to ask no questions, to have faith in their leadership. In this way, Army men believe, progress can be made and must be made. They are honest in their viewpoint, because that has been their training and their environment.

This sort of sentiment is not new in the Army. Back in 1915 Maj. Gen. John F. O'Ryan, who is presently engaged in an economic survey for the Japanese Government, gave his idea of what democracy means to an Army man when he was advocating passage of a conscription bill. Listen to this:

The first thing that must be done is to destroy all initiative and that with the training fits men to be soldiers. The recruit does not know how to carry out orders. His mental state differs from that of the trained soldier who obeys mechanically. We must get our men so that they are machines. We have to have our men trained so that the influence of fear is overpowered by the peril of an uncompromising military system often backed up by a pistol in the hands of an officer. The recruits have got to put their heads into the military noose. They have got to be jacked up. They have got to be bawled out.

That is why we are to give the men training for a year—

So that the influence of fear is overpowered by the peril of an uncompromising military system often backed up by a pistol in the hands of an officer.

This, of course, will be recognized as the concept of society underlying the regions which we know today as Fascist. There is no cause to be surprised at this, for in the final analysis militarism is dictatorship, and dictatorship is of necessity militaristic. The two are necessarily intertwined.

In Germany and Italy the military and the state have in effect merged to become one and the same. In Japan, however, it is still possible to see the military dictatorship operating par excellence, with every phase of civilian life subject to its dominance. Our Army now proposes to bring the military influence into every phase of our lives as thoroughly as has been done in the land of the rising sun. Will not our society follow suit?

Part of the training which our men will receive during the training period will be in citizenship. This has been pointed to as further proof of the benefits of conscription in inculcating democracy. But the citizenship and democracy which will be inculcated will not be the civilian variety. Here, for example, is the manner in which "democracy" was defined for 4 years—1928–1932—in the Army Training Manual—No. 2000–25:

Democracy: A government of the masses, authority derived through mass meeting or any other form of direct expression. Results in mobocracy. Attitude toward property is communistic—negating property rights. Attitude toward law is that the will of the majority shall regulate, whether it be based upon deliberations or governed by passion, prejudice, and impulse, without restraint or regard for consequences. Results in demagogism, license, agitation, discontent, anarchy.

I appreciate the fact that there are men in this country who fully believe in that philosophy and fully believe that that is what democracy means. They fully believe that every time a Senator rises on the floor of the Senate and disagrees with them, he must be illiterate or uneducated, a demagog, or something worse. But fortunately—or unfortunately—the people of this country have noted the activities of those holding such beliefs from the beginning of our history down to the present time. They are the same Tories who wanted to keep this country a part of the British Empire. We had them in Philadelphia. We had them in Boston. We had them in Baltimore. We have them in this country today. They have not changed. They looked upon Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson, and every great liberal who did not agree to let the Army run the Government of the United States and the great financial interests run the country as demagogues; and they looked upon democracy as anarchy.

This definition should occasion no surprise since it logically stems from the Army man's dominant principle—order and discipline. Democracy is anarchistic because it lacks the orderliness of a military society, because the rabble waste time discussing and asking questions when it should be obeying the barked commands of their superiors.

This, then, is the type of citizenship and democracy to which millions of our men are about to be subjected. Make no mistake about it, Mr. President, millions of our citizens will feel the whiplash of militarism. I desire to emphasize again that during the first year 12,000,000 men are liable to come under the domination of the military the moment they are registered. As soon as they are notified they are drafted, no longer are they free American civilians, subject to civil procedures in civil courts. They become subject to the summary proceedings of military law and courts martial. Not only must those conscripted keep their mouths shut and obey orders, but all those who are registered, even though they are not yet in the Army, must live under a pall of fear, and must weigh their words, for the morrow may bring their summons to the Army.

What all this means is that the Bill of Rights, the guaranties of trial by jury, equal protection, due process—all the hard-won liberties of centuries—go up in smoke, to be replaced by the court martial where the judge and jury are the soldier's superior officers. By them he is tried not only for the usual criminal offenses but for a long list of such things as any reproachful or provoking speeches or gestures or even for any conduct not specified which the court martial may decide is an offense.

What sort of democracy will the mere registration of our populace bring? Have we forgotten that during the last war every man walked about expecting to be tapped on the shoulder, stopped in the street?

A well-known historian of the period has recorded:

In Chicago in 4 days during July 1918 more than 150,000 men were stopped by police and Federal agents and ordered to show their registration cards. In eastern New York and southern New Jersey 57,000 suspects were arrested, directed to fill out cards, and ultimately released only after check of the information given. Senator Caldwell stated on the floor of the Senate that he saw armed soldiers in New York seizing men in theaters, streetcars, and at work. The prisoners were then kept under detention until they proved they were not slackers.

The hearings of the munitions investigation quotes that eminent wartime executive, Mr. Bernard Baruch, as saying that the work or fight principle is far more effective than any chain gang or impressment that could be invented.

Do you wonder, Mr. President, that American labor, organized and unorganized, stands united in opposition to peacetime conscription?

Enact peacetime conscription and no longer will this be a free land; no longer will a citizen be able to say that he disagrees with a governmental proclamation or edict. Hushed whispers will replace free speech; secret meetings in dark places will supplant free assemblage; labor and industry, men and women, will be shackled by the chains they have themselves forged; and all this, mark you, while this last great democracy is still at peace. Is this the sort of society for which our forbears shed their blood? Is this the goal for which we strive?

It is not cause for wonder, then, that some of our citizens should stand aghast at the prospect of turning our populace over to the unrestricted control of the military.

As to the efficiency which the military produces, it is interesting to note that Great Britain, fighting voluntarily for her life, has nevertheless found it necessary to place a committee made up principally of civilians in control of the war office for the purpose of overhauling the administrative system and cutting out red tape. The orderliness of Army men does not always bring efficiency; but, if uncontrolled, it must inevitably bring dictatorship.

Mr. President, the original Burke-Wadsworth bill recited in its preamble that "the Congress hereby declares that the integrity and institutions of the United States are gravely threatened." The Military Affairs Committee has stricken that clause from the revised bill. It was precisely this clause, however, which I regarded as the only worthwhile sentence in the entire original measure, and I deeply deplore its omission from the pending bill.

For I say to you, Mr. President, and I say it with all the solemnity of which I am capable, the integrity and institutions of the United States are indeed gravely threatened, and it is the bill now before the Senate and the hysteria which bred it which create that threat.

If you pass this bill, you slit the throat of the last democracy still living; you accord to Hitler his greatest and cheapest victory to date. On the headstone of American democracy he will inscribe—"Here lies the foremost victim of the war of nerves."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10065) to provide for the registration and regulation of investment companies and investment advisers, and for other purposes.

AMERICANIZATION OF THE PEOPLE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, when on the 1st of August, 1939, I addressed the Senate on the Rights of Citizens of the District of Columbia, it was in the performance of a duty to the voteless and unrepresented fellow Americans of the National Capital community. It was then near the end of the session, nothing had been done for the relief of these fine people, and there was no prospect of action to give them their rightful place in the councils of the Nation.

Today it is with much lighter heart that I rise to address the Senate on the same subject, for suddenly there has appeared a bright prospect of success. Our Democratic friends stole the march on us Republicans by including in their national platform a plank committing the party to granting suffrage to the people of the District of Columbia. We Republicans were ready to meet their challenge; so that now, irrespective of party, we are lined up to Americanize the people of the District after all their years of bondage.

Beginning long ago, convinced that there is no American reason for depriving the people of the District of Columbia of their rightful participation in their National Government, I have consistently and persistently supported the proposals to empower Congress to grant voting representation to District people in the Senate, the House of Representatives, and among the electors of President and Vice President. When the late Senator Wesley L. Jones, of the State of Washington, passed on, I introduced in Congress the joint resolution drafted by him.

Senator Jones in 1922 reported from the Senate District Committee a joint resolution which specifically would have granted to Congress the power, when included in the Federal Constitution, to give the District one Senator, Representatives in the House of Representatives according to population, and Presidential electors equal to the aggregate representation in Congress. It also gave District citizens the same rights in the Federal courts as if they were citizens of a State. This report was reaffirmed by the Senate District Committee in 1927.

In my address last year I made reference to the House Joint Resolution 257 introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative SUMNERS of Texas, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. That resolution proposes a much simpler amendment to the Constitution than proposed by my Senate Joint Resolution 35. The Sumners amendment would grant to Congress broad powers under which the entire program of details carried in my resolution could be accomplished. In addition, the Sumners amendment would give Congress further power to delegate such of its power of exclusive legislation, not inconsistent with the national interest, as it may from time to time desire. Furthermore, under the amendment, the Congress is specifically given the power of amendment and repeal of any legislation. Thus, if Congress finds at any time that it has made a mistake, it may recapture any such grants of power.

The Sumners proposal completely answers objections which have been raised against all of the other national representation resolutions as attempts to write a statute into the Constitution. I am strongly in favor of the Sumners amendment in its original form, but not with the amendment proposed by the House Committee on the Judiciary, which eliminates the right of Congress to grant to the District representation in the Senate. The people of the District deserve and need to be represented in the Congress, which consists of both the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Mr. President, I am encouraged to believe that before the present session of Congress adjourns we shall take the long-deferred step to right a great wrong which has done a great injustice to a fine, intelligent, public-spirited, and patriotic people. I believe we are ready to pass the Sumners resolution by the necessary two-thirds vote of the two Houses, and pass it on to the State legislatures for ratification. I am confident that the legislatures will be prompt to ratify the amendment to do this act of simple justice.

The full hearings before the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia in 1916 and 1921–22, and the hearings before the House Committee on the Judiciary in 1921, 1926, 1928, and 1938, have made a full and complete record available to Members of the Senate. It is my belief that no new hearing would develop any new facts, with the probable exception of later statistics supplying additional evidence in support of the proposal. In these hearings the underlying principles with which we have to deal are exhaustively and convincingly discussed, so that no objection on American grounds can be offered against them. There is ample record upon which to base immediate action. This is a fundamental American question, and no sound American objection can be raised against it.

The amendment to the Sumners proposal is not in keeping with the intent by constitutional amendment to grant broad powers to Congress, so that it may properly function as the body possessing and exercising exclusive legislation in all cases over the seat of Government. The idea which prompted the amendment is based on an entirely erroneous conception of the Senate.

Mr. President, there has been some very illuminating discussion in the Senate of the question of representation which should be made available for convenient reference by Members of the Senate. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD extracts from the Citizens' Joint Committee brief submitted to the House Committee on the Judiciary in January 1921, on House Joint Resolutions 11 and 32, and extracts from the argument of Theodore W. Noyes before the House Committee on the Judiciary in January 1921.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Extracts from the Citizens' Joint Committee brief submitted to the House Committee on the Judiciary January 1921 on House Joint Resolutions 11 and 32]

NO STATE DEPRIVED OF EQUAL SUFFRAGE

We are not aware of any objection to the merits of our cause which would warrant further discussion. It has been objected, however, that one provision of the Constitution presents an insuperable obstacle to an amendment admitting the people of the District to representation in the Senate.

The point made is that to do so would necessarily affect the guaranteed equality of the States in that body. What is relied on, of course, is the last clause of article 10, "and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

But manifestly a State is not deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate by reducing its existing aliquot proportion of the total number of Senators exercising the lawmaking power. Otherwise it would have to be conceded that the original States were deprived of their equal suffrage in the Senate by the admission of Vermont. And so on at each succeeding admission of a State.

What, then, does equality here mean? It means that no State shall have greater representation in the Senate than any other State. In what way, we may ask, would the presence of one or two Senators from the District of Columbia operate to give any State greater representation than any other State? Clearly the amendment we propose will not deprive any State of its equal suffrage.

This clause in article 10 is the sole provision in the text of the Constitution to which it is possible to point as offering even an apparent bar to what we propose.

REPRESENTATION NOT CONFINED TO "SOVEREIGN" STATES

There is a somewhat vague and elusive argument, not grounded on any particular provision of the Constitution, which is frequently met with. It usually runs in this form: Nothing but a sovereign State can have representation in the Senate. Representatives of the District, therefore, cannot be admitted there unless by a total repeal of the 10-miles-square provision the District is first made a full-fledged State. In order to accomplish that result Congress would have to surrender its control of the Federal District.

Now, this argument, let us repeat, is not grounded upon any specific provision of the Constitution, much less upon one that is immune from amendment. It has its origin only in certain abstract and supposedly philosophical deductions regarding the nature of a Federal Government. It will not bear analysis. Nor does it express any cardinal principle of our Constitution.

To say that the Senate is now composed only of Members selected by the States is merely to declare an obvious fact. That is simply because the Constitution as it stands provides that "the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State." Formerly it went on to say "chosen by the legislatures thereof," but that is a thing of the past. What remains, however, is no less subject to amendment. There is no fundamental principle of our Constitution which forbids its amendment so as to admit into the Senate, any more than into the House of Representatives, Members who shall represent an integral part of the country, such as the District of Columbia, without any necessity of requiring that area to be for all conceivable purposes precisely like the existing States. In fact, the existing States are not all on an absolute parity outside of their equal representation in the Senate, for the scope of the lawmaking power of several is limited by conditions in the acts by which they were admitted.

The theory we are now discussing is plainly a survival of the exploded notion that Senators are in essence ambassadors from sovereign States. This notion was once regarded as a necessary corollary of the most extreme form of the States rights' doctrine.

There was, indeed, a certain historical excuse for it, so far as the Original Thirteen States were concerned. But whatever warrant it once had ceased altogether when new States began to be carved out of the western territory. In the admission of new States, such as Wyoming or Idaho, Arizona or Oklahoma, all basis for it vanished altogether. Especially now that Senators are elected by the people there is no assignable reason why the National Senate should not include representatives of any territory occupied by an organized body of American people whose numbers and importance qualify them to be represented. It is not at all necessary that such a body should have the same kind of local government as is possessed by the States.

Since Senators are now everywhere elected directly by the people, the people of the District of Columbia, to the extent of their right to do the same thing, would stand in the same position as the people of a State. For all purposes connected with representation in the National Congress that is sufficient. State legislatures no longer elect Senators. It is manifestly immaterial then for the purpose that the District would have no legislature. In truth, State legislatures, when they elected Senators, did not act as legislatures in the real sense of lawmaking assemblies but only as specially designated bodies of electors. In performing that function the members of the two houses of each State legislature acted without regard to the extent of and wholly apart from their functions as lawmakers for the local community.

The fallacy of the whole contention under consideration consists in confusing the traditional conception of the States as a group of sovereign Commonwealths combining in their corporate capacities to form a limited Union with the essential and permanent constitutional conception of representative government by houses composed of representatives chosen by the people of defined territorial areas, having such a socially organized life as constitutes them convenient and reasonable units of political action.

The District of Columbia presents the case of just such a political unit; neither in the fundamental framework of the Constitution, nor in the text of any of its provisions, is there anything incompatible with recognition as such.

When Burke was warring with furious fervor against the doctrines of the French Revolution, he declared, "The rights of men in governments are their advantages." We have come to realize that there must be a deeper basis for that irresistible desire of men everywhere for a voice in the governments which mold their destinies.

[Extracts from argument by Theodore W. Noyes before House Committee on the Judiciary, January 1921]

Mr. NOYES. It is objected that only sovereign States with equal suffrage can be represented in the Senate; that the representation sought by the District could be had only by unanimous consent of the States; and that the Nation is impotent, even through constitutional amendment, to give the District this representation.

If it is possible to conceive of any constitutional amendment as being itself unconstitutional, the objection of unconstitutionality would not apply to the pending constitutional amendment. It is natural and logical to extend an existing power of Congress to the extent and for the purpose suggested. So natural and logical is the grant of national representation for the District in the manner proposed that there is room for the contention that Congress may give it under the Constitution as it now stands, without any amendment whatsoever.

The Constitution does not explicitly prohibit the existence of a State with genuine voting representation in Congress, which lacks some of the attributes of a sovereign State. It is not declared that all the American communities represented as States in Congress must be on precisely the same footing and be shaped in identically the same mold. To the contrary, the Constitutional Convention refused to pledge to new States to be admitted to the Union, equality of treatment with the original States. The first proposition for the admission of new States provided that "The new States shall be admitted on the same terms with the original States."

By the vote of 9 States against 2, these words were stricken out. Debate disclosed that the large States gave the small States equality of representation in the Senate only because it was absolutely necessary if the federation of equal States was to be converted into a Union, but the action of the Convention shows that the original States, large and small, refused definitely to pledge equality to future new States, and so far as the Constitution is concerned, reserved entire liberty of action in respect to the conditions of admission.

Congress, though not compelled by the Constitution to do so, has admitted new States on equal terms with the old, limited, however, in the case of some of the later States, like Utah, by certain irrevocable conditions.

The question of the power of Congress under the Constitution as it stands to give national representation to the District is, however, academic. If the constitutional provisions, taken together prevent the admission to the Union of a nonsovereign State merely by act of Congress, these constitutional obstacles can, of course, be removed by amendments to the Constitution itself. On the assumption that a change in the organic law of the Nation is essential to accomplish that for which we petition, we are now asking for this very constitutional amendment.

The effect of this amendment is not to admit the District into the Union as a State, but to give the 437,000 (now 663,153) Americans residing in the 10 miles square under the exclusive control of Congress the same representation as citizens of a State in Congress and the electoral college. Not a new State, but a new political status is created or evolved. This amendment operates as a supplement of the 10 miles square provision, defining explicitly in view of the changes of more than a century the political status of the residents of the Federal District. It alters the existing law of congressional and electoral college representation, and creates a new American constituency with representation in Congress and the electoral college; not a new State but a politically uplifted District of Columbia, an enfranchised 10 miles square, already created and made unique by the Constitution. This new factor in our scheme of National Government representation may be unusual, peculiar, extraordinary, but it is not so unusual, peculiar, and extraordinary as the original creation and present-day retention by the great Republic of the totally unrepresented 10 miles square, a district physically within the United States, even containing its Capital, but politically outside of the United States.

The States uniting under the Constitution had the power, which they exercised, of creating this unique, unrepresented, Capital-containing, Nation-controlled District. Two-thirds of Congress and three-fourths of the States have the same power, which they should exercise, to give to the people of this unique District an equally unique political status.

But it is contended that the Constitution prohibits its own amendment in the manner and for the purpose proposed by us. For the perpetual protection of the small State no State is ever without its consent to be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. The question raised is whether the grant of one or two Senators to the seat of government would impair the equal suffrage of any State or of all the States in the Senate and would thus require the unanimous consent of the States.

The purpose of the provision was to protect the smaller States by giving them in perpetuity equal representation with the larger States in the Senate.

The entrance of two Senators, representing a new State, into the Senate does not affect this equality of representation irrespective of population; nor would the entry of one or two Senators representing the seat of government impair this equality. No new State or American community given by the Constitution representation in the Senate can have greater representation in that body than that enjoyed by Nevada or New York; nor can it have smaller representation without its consent.

The purpose of the Constitution to protect the small State is defeated only if some other State has a greater representation in the Senate without the small State's consent. There is no violation of this prohibition if some other State has, with its consent, a smaller representation in the Senate than the other States. It is not compulsory that all the States or American communities represented in the Senate shall have precisely the same representation in the Senate, for the Constitution permits any State with its consent to be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

When Oklahoma sends two new Senators to the Senate the percentage of sovereignty exercised by the two Senators of Nevada or New York is reduced, but neither State is deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. The effect would be the same if the seat of government were by constitutional amendment granted representation in the Senate. It could not have three Senators without depriving Nevada, New York, and the other States of their equal suffrage; it could not have one except with its own consent, as the Constitution provides. But a constitutional amendment which gave the seat of government two Senators or, with its own consent, one Senator, violates in no respect the right of any State to equal suffrage in the Senate.

Protection is afforded by the Constitution only against an injurious inequality in Senate representation and the consent to such inequality is only required from the one injured or disadvantaged by it.

The imputation that the Nation is impotent to give national representation to the District, even by constitutional amendment, slurs the great Republic in comparison with other representative republics, and reverses the trend of American history and the American record, which steadily deny national impotency and ever exalt the Nation's power.

* * * * * * *

Is it conceivable that the forefathers in framing the Constitution in such fashion as to protect the existence, rights, and dignity of the feebler States, so worded that instrument as to render the new Government forever impotent to grant national representation to a half million or a million of national taxpayers, soldiers, sailors, and civilians, resident in the future in the 10-mile square?

If at the time when the Constitution was framed one might have so construed that instrument (a compact of union between 13 independent communities of varying population, jealous, wrangling, suspicious, apprehensive), is it conceivable that the Constitution can be so construed today? Does the doctrine of national impotency under the Constitution still survive after the Nation-strengthening decisions of John Marshall's Supreme Court and its successors; after President Jefferson's construction of the national powers in the Louisiana Purchase; after the referendum verdict of the people in arms in the Civil War; after the later constitutional amendments, including the Civil War amendments and that providing for the popular election of Senators; and after the nationalizing executive action and legislation in connection with the World War?

The forefathers had no thought that the seat of government would remain without inhabitants; that it would not grow as a city like other American cities, and that this growth would be paralyzed and not promoted by the fact that it was the National Capitol. George Washington looked for the development of a city in the 10 miles square which would be certainly exceeded in population, he thought, only by London. It is inconceivable that the forefathers ever intended the Americans collected in the seat of government to remain forever without the fundamental privilege of representation like other Americans—in a government of, by, and for the people.

The original population of the District did not entitle it to representation in the National Government. The population grew so slowly, on account of unjust treatment by the Nation, that only in 1870 or perhaps only in 1880 did its permanent population exceed distinctly and unmistakably the number represented in the House by each Representative. Only then did equity demand that such national representation be found for this American community as is consistent with the control by Congress, representing the Nation, of the seat of government.

While specific provision was made by the Constitution only for the absolute needs expressed in the simplest terms of a government binding in one 13 jealous, discordant, wrangling, and distrustful communities, and while no express provision or promise was made of the future Americanization at a suitable time of the residents of the seat of government, first, there was no specific prohibition of such future representation, condemning the residents of the seat of government in perpetuity to the status of political aliens; second, the prediction and promise of such future representation when the population of the seat of government became sufficient are found in the early discussions in and out of Congress of the status of the District; third, the Constitution was so framed as possibly to permit the grant of this representation by Congress without the necessity of a constitutional amendment; and, fourth, the conviction is irresistible that any obstacles that remain at this day against such representation under the Constitution as it stands can be easily put aside by a suitable constitutional amendment.

The Constitution makers divided the United States into, first, States; second, territory belonging to the United States, the material from which new States are made; and, third, the seat of Government of the United States. In its lifetime the Nation has in succession added vast areas to the territory belonging to the United States, and from this territory has carved additional States until these States, in the beginning 13, now number 48. All of the territory belonging to the United States in the continental and contiguous United States, from Maine and Florida to California and from Canada to Mexico, is now converted into States, except the seat of government, the Maryland portion of the 10 miles square.

The Constitution defines the status of citizens of a State. The status of the citizen of a Territory or incipient State is reasonably well settled. The representative status of the citizen or resident of the seat of government has not yet been finally determined by the Constitution. Changed conditions make it absolutely essential that the Constituion should now define it.

It was not contemplated that the seat of government should ever become a sovereign State and be relieved from exclusive government by Congress representing the whole Nation, nor was it contemplated, on the other hand, that any American community exceeding in population, intelligence, patriotism, and taxable resources a number of the States should be denied due representation in the National Legislature and in the Electoral College. The problem is to harmonize these two fundamental American principles—to give the Americans resident in the District due representation in the Government which can take away their property by taxation and their lives by sending them to war and at the same time to retain that control by Congress, representing the Nation, over the seat of government, which was regarded by the forefathers as a vital necessity for the national welfare.

The pending constitutional amendment harmonizes these two vital American principles.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an extract from the argument of Theodore W. Noyes, chairman of the Citizens' Joint Committee on District of Columbia National Representation, before the Senate District Committee in November and December 1921 and January 1922—hearings, page 251.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. NOYES. What was the intent of the framers of the Constitution as to the future political status of the people of the District?

Very likely they had no distinct intent and gave no thought at all to provision concerning the future status of the imaginary population of a hypothetical city. If they thought at all on the subject they probably thought that in giving Congress power to admit new States, and to dispose of and regulate territory belonging to the United States they had cared for any future population of the Nation's city, just as by these provisions they had arranged for the political future of every other American in the entire territorial area of the United States, present and prospective.

If they did not think at all about the future status of a bit of territory which might under the Constitution be so small in size that its population would never be otherwise than negligible, it was because they were engaged in a desperate struggle to overcome deadly political dangers of the strenuous present and to get 13 jealous, wrangling communities, that were equal in the federation that had broken down, to make the sacrifices necessary to create the American Union. At times the task seemed almost hopeless. Consider, for example, the conflict over the issue of State equality of representation in the Senate. This equality was denied by the Convention, and denied again; but finally was granted as an indispensable condition of securing adherence to the Union of certain small States. It was granted grudgingly by the vote of 5 States against 4, with 1 State divided. The Convention emphasized the fact that this concession was wrung under a sort of duress by certain small States by refusing to declare in the Constitution itself that new States should enter the Union on terms of equality with the old States. The debates in the Convention show clearly that equality of Senate representation was granted under compulsion only to existing States, small and large, and that so far as the Constitution is concerned full liberty of action was reserved to Congress to negotiate the terms of entrance of new States into the Union. The Constitution makers did not know from day to day whether there would be a Union. Disturbed and distracted over this vital problem, they may be forgiven if they forgot to project themselves into the future in order to provide properly for the American rights in the remote future of a Territory which had no minimum limit of area, and which might be so small as not to be able ever to secure more than the most meager and negligible of local populations.

The other alternative is that the Constitution makers did think of the future rights of the possible capital community, and believed that they had safeguarded these rights, if any ever developed, by the power given to Congress to dispose of and to regulate territory belonging to the United States and the power to admit new States, coupled with the free hand given to Congress by the Constitution concerning the terms upon which new States might be admitted, enabling Congress, if it wished, to admit a new State with its consent which was not on equal terms with the other States, and which had not even equal representation in the Senate.

Senator SHEPPARD. And they left the Constitution open to amendment?

Mr. NOYES. Yes. I think, too, that the Constitution itself, interpreted by the debate that accompanied the framing of it (in spite of the fact that Congress has admitted all new States on terms of equality, except perhaps Utah), indicates that the Constitution framers left it in such condition that Congress had a free hand, and that if our request for national representation had come up before a particular construction had been given to the Constitution by the admission of many States on terms of perfect equality with the original States, it would have been possible to admit without any constitutional amendment the seat of government as a new State, a peculiar State, a State without equal representation with its consent. If there could be a State without equal representation in the Senate, of course, there could be a State with its own consent that was limited in any other regard.

The Constitution makers may have thought that these provisions of the Constitution were broad enough to enable Congress to do political equity to any future population of the seat of government, by giving that population, when its numbers justified the step, national representation by constitutional amendment or in some other way not inconsistent with the exclusive legislative power of congress in respect to the Federal District.

I have here in this connection some extracts from Elliott's Debates on the Federal Constitution, to which I should like to call your attention.

ELLIOTT'S DEBATES ON FEDERAL CONSTITUTION, VOLUME 5

Page 316. After being repeatedly defeated, proposition of equality of vote in Senate was finally adopted by vote of five States (Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and North Carolina) with four opposed (Pennsylvania, Virginia, South Carolina, and Georgia) and Massachusetts divided.

Page 492, article 17, provision for admission of new States—under consideration.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out the last two sentences to wit: "If the admission be consented to the new States shall be admitted on the same terms with the original States. But the legislature may make conditions with the new States concerning the public debt which shall then be subsisting." He did not wish to bind down the legislature to admit Western States on the terms here stated.

Mr. Madison opposed the motion, insisting that the Western States neither would nor ought to submit to a union which degraded them from an equal rank with the other States.

Col. MASON. If it were possible by just means to prevent emigration to the western country it might be good policy. But go the people will as they find it for their interest; and the best policy is to treat them with that equality which will make them friends, not enemies.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris did not mean to discourage the growth of the western country. He knew that to be impossible. He did not wish, however, to throw the power into their hands.

Mr. Sherman was against the motion and for fixing an equality of privileges by the Constitution.

Mr. Langdon was in favor of the motion. He did not know but circumstances might arise which would render it inconvenient to admit new States on terms of equality.

Mr. Williamson was for leaving the legislature free. The existing small States enjoy an equality now (under confederation) and for that reason are admitted to it in the Senate. This reason is not applicable to new Western States.

On Mr. Gouverneur Morris' motion for striking out, nine States (New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia) voted aye, and two (Maryland and Virginia) voted no.

Page 497. Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved: "The legislature shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, etc." Agreed to, Maryland alone dissenting.

Adopted. Ten miles square provision; seat of government; nem. con. (See p. 511.)

Page 553. Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to annex a further proviso, "That no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." This motion, being dictated by the circulating murmurs of the small States, was agreed to without debate, no one opposing it or on the question saying no.

Page 357. Luther Martin of Maryland voted against Senators' votes per capita, "as departing from the idea of the States being represented in the second branch."

Page 374. Discussion without action of question of location of seat of government.

Colonel Mason observed that it would be proper as he thought that some provision should be made in the Constitution against choosing for the seat of the general government the city or place at which the seat of any State government might be fixed. There were two objections against having them at the same place which, without mentioning others, required some precaution on the subject. The first was that it tended to produce disputes concerning jurisdiction. The second and principal one was that the intermixture of the two legislatures tended to give a provincial tincture to the national deliberations. He moved that the committee be instructed to receive a clause to prevent the seat of the National Government being in the same city or town with the seat of government of any State, longer than until the necessary public buildings could be erected.

The idea was approved, but policy of making enemies of Philadelphia and New York was questioned and motion was withdrawn.

Mr. Butler was for fixing by the Constitution the place, and a central one, for the seat of government.

In course of debate one delegate suggested that equality of State representation in one legislative body did not make government representative of States when under veto power one-third legislative power in a President who came from only one of the States. Even in Senate Senators vote per capita.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I also ask to have printed in the RECORD an article by Mr. Jesse C. Suter, appearing in the Washington Sunday Star of August 4, 1940.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMNERS PLAN ACTION BRINGS BOTH JOY AND DISAPPOINTMENT

(By Jesse C. Suter)

The people of the District of Columbia have occasion for jubilation over the action Thursday by the House of Representatives Committee on the Judiciary ordering a favorable report on the Sumners proposed amendment to the Constitution empowering Congress to Americanize them. There is a tinge of disappointment because of the illogical mutilation of the original Sumners joint resolution by limiting the representation in Congress to the House of Representatives.

There is no special reason for discouragement as there was a strong sentiment in the committee opposed to this change, and it may be possible to restore the original language on the floor of the House. This means an opportunity for additional work by people who have direct or indirect influence with Members of the House.

Within a short time after the action of the House committee, Senator WILLIAM H. KING introduced in the Senate the joint resolution, in original form. Senator KING heads the subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, to which it was referred.

THE SUMNERS PROPOSAL EXPLAINED

The Sumners amendment, in its original form, is a broad enabling provision to increase the power of Congress, and thereby permit it to discharge efficiently its responsibility of governing the seat of government. Under it Congress would have power—

1. To provide for the people of the District representation in the Congress and among the electors of President and Vice President no greater than that of the people of the States;

2. To delegate to such government as Congress may establish in the District all or any of its powers over the said District; and it

3. Extends the judicial power of the United States to District citizens on an equal footing with citizens of a State; and, finally,

4. It makes all legislation enacted under the amendment subject to amendment or repeal except that such amendment or repeal shall not affect the office of Senator or Representative during the time for which he was selected.

That is all there is to the original proposal. It contains no legislative detail, it is not a statute, being intentionally as broad as is possible. There is no mention of the kind of suffrage which might be granted, the extent of representation in Congress or in the electoral college. It makes no provision for any particular kind of local government, but it does give Congress the power to relieve itself, if it so desires, of some of its legislative duties by delegation of power to whatever local government it might establish.

The Sumners proposal is intended to be a broad fundamental constitutional provision, free from controversial details which will have to be worked out by Congress in subsequent legislation.

REPRESENTATION IN THE SENATE

The committee amendment striking out "Congress" and inserting "House of Representatives" would deprive the Congress of the power to give the District representation in the Senate and would automatically reduce the District representation among the Presidential electors. There is no sound logic in this position taken by the committee.

The denial of representation in the Senate is based on the long exploded theory that the Senators are the ambassadors of the States. This idea was in the discard long before the substitution of the election of Senators by direct vote of the people for election by the legislatures. The Senators represent the people as much as do the Representatives, only they represent a State-wide constituency instead of a district.

It is especially illogical for the District people to be deprived of representation in the Senate. It is the Congress that is clothed with the power of exclusive legislation over the District. The House of Representatives is not the Congress. That important legislative branch of the Federal Government is composed of both House of Representatives and Senate.

This is an old question which has been, from time to time, raised by Members of Congress. The various forms of the national representation amendment have been framed to meet such question. The amendment favorably reported by the Senate District Committee in 1922 provided for one Senator. The committee in 1927 reaffirmed the action of 1922.

The pending Capper-Norton joint resolution was framed by the late Senator Wesley L. Jones, of Washington, and provides for "one or two Senators, as determined by the Congress, or such other representation in the Senate as Congress may provide."

SENATE DISTRICT COMMITTEE REPORT OF 1922

The favorable report of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia in 1922 dealt with the entire subject of national representation so thoroughly and logically that it has become a valuable textbook on the subject. No part of this report is stronger or more illuminating than the part dealing with the question of representation in the Senate. Space will not permit quoting extensively from this report.

On this subject the report concludes as follows: "There is no principle in our Constitution, much less any specific provision in its articles, which forbids its amendment so as to admit into the Senate as well as the House Members who shall represent an integral part of the country such as the District of Columbia without requiring that area shall be precisely like the existing States. The only limitation is that in thus amending the Constitution no State should be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate * * * and the equality of the States in the Senate will not be in anywise affected by the proposed amendment."

WOODWARD PERTINENT DISCUSSION OF 1801

The question of representation of the Territory of Columbia in the Senate was discussed very convincingly by A. B. Woodward in a series of pamphlets published in Washington and Alexandria in 1801. He was a friend of Thomas Jefferson and was here during the laying out of the city. Some years later he became Federal Commissioner of the then recently erected Territory of Michigan, which was carved out of the Northwest Territory. He was a logical thinker whose Considerations on the Government of the Territory of Columbia are as timely as if written today.

The population here at that time was about 15,000 souls, as he put it, and he had this to say about them: "I consider the 15,000 to be as able to sustain any burden as an equal number of souls in any other part of the United States."

In his paper No. II, published in Washington in 1801, he said in part: "The government of the Territory of Columbia must be considered under two relations—first, as it respects the Federal Government; and second, as regards its local concerns.

"With regard to its connection with Federal Government, two inquiries present themselves: First, whether it ought to be represented in the Legislature of the United States, and, if so, whether in one House only, or in both; and, second, whether it ought to have a part in the election of the President and Vice President of the United States.

"In order to come to a determination of these questions it will be proper to ascertain with precision how far it ought to be contemplated as a State and in what respects it differs from a State. It must be considered as somewhat analogous to a State in being an association of men, for civil purposes, under a peculiar and singular authority.

"This Territory, however, differs from a State in this particular, that whereas the Federal Government is entitled, by the Constitution, to exercise over a State, only the authority particularly delegated to it, on certain subjects, and leaves the State in an undiminished position of its sovereignty as to others; the Territory of Columbia is placed by the Constitution under the absolute and uncontrollable sovereignty of the United States and possesses in itself none of the attributes of State sovereignty.

"In this situation, the people of the Territory of Columbia do not cease to be a part of the people of the United States, and as such they are still entitled to the enjoyment of the same rights with the rest of the people of the United States, and to have some participation in the administration of their General Government. It is contrary to the genius of our Constitution, it is violating an original principle in republicanism, to deny that all who are governed by laws ought to participate in the formation of them.

"The people of this Territory therefore ought to be represented in the Legislature of the United States; and to have a voice in the election of a President and Vice President. But shall they be represented in the House of Representatives only; or in the Senate also?

"The Senate of the United States possesses a part of the legislative power; and it is certainly consonant to principle that those over whom that power is to operate should, if it can possibly be done, possess some voice in their transactions.

"Would it be proper then to place the Territory on an equal footing with a State, and give it two Senators; or ought a distinction to be made? As a distinction exists in fact between the Territory and a State, it appears proper to recognize this distinction in giving it representation in the Senate.

"As it cannot, if a distinction is made, be on an equality with a State, and possess two votes, and as it cannot be represented at all with less than one vote, it would appear advisable to allow it one vote and assign it one Senator."

Woodward, in an appendix to this paper, submitted a draft of a proposed amendment to the Constitution which would have given the District a Senator and representation in the House proportioned to its population. It would have been entitled to a voteless Member of the House until the population entitled it to a full voting Representative and also to have one Presidential elector until its population would entitle it to a Representative and then to have two electors. From then on the number of Representatives and electors would increase as the population increased.

The all-important question (national representation) Woodward held was "whether the people of the Territory of Columbia shall be slaves or freemen."

In conclusion of his paper No. VII he said: "It is alone on the firmness and perseverance of reflecting and patriotic characters that the citizens of the United States of America, residing within the Territory of Columbia, can now repose their hopes of relief. Such characters have saved our country before, and they will save us. The will of the people will be finally triumphant; and it can never be the desire of a free and generous people to fraternize with a band of slaves."

WALTER CHWALEK

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, on April 22, 1940, the Senate passed Senate bill 3555, for the relief of Walter Chwalek, which, on April 23, was referred to the House Committee on Claims.

On May 29, 1940, quite some time later, the House passed House bill 7173, an identical House bill, instead of taking up the Senate bill, and as a result neither bill has passed both Houses.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that the House bill, now at the desk, may be taken up and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 7173) for the relief of Walter Chwalek was read twice by its title, considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Walter Chwalek, of Oswego, N. Y., the sum of $2,938.50, in full settlement of all claims against the United States as the result of his receiving personal and property damages when his automobile was struck by a truck in the service of the United States Army on August 24, 1937: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

REGULATION OF FIRE, MARINE, AND CASUALTY INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, in March of this year Commissioner Hazen, of the District of Columbia, addressed to Speaker BANKHEAD a letter in which he very properly and correctly pointed out that there was considerable need for provision by Congress for the regulation of the business of fire, marine, casualty, and title insurance in the District of Columbia. As a result there was written House bill 9722, which now is on our calendar under No. 2008.

When the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, recently called up the bill I asked if he would kindly forbear pressing the bill for action at that time, for there were a few points which I felt very properly ought to be corrected in the draft of the bill as filed. With his usual courtesy, the Senator from Utah was quite willing to defer action; and the bill therefore went back to the calendar, where it now reposes. Meanwhile, as I told him I would do, I have gone into the matter of preparing the proposed amendments. I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point of my remarks the first proposed amendment which I shall offer, underlined as I have drawn it, so that it will appear italicized and new matter will thus become readily apparent, and stricken as indicated in the proposed language to indicate what changes were made by striking from the pending bill certain language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

On page 18, line 20, strike out present section 2 and insert new section 2, as follows:

[Stricken language in brackets, new language in italics]

"(2) Casualty: (a) Upon the health of persons, or against injury, disablement, or death of persons resulting from traveling or general accidents by land or water, and against liability of the assured for injuries to employees or other persons; (b) against liability of the assured for loss or destruction of or damage to property; (c) upon the lives of domestic animals; (d) [upon plate glass against breakage;] against loss of or damage to glass and its appurtenances; (e) [upon boilers against explosions, and against loss or damage to life or property resulting therefrom, and against loss or damage resulting from the breakage of machinery;] against loss of or damage to any property resulting from the explosion of or injury to any boiler, heater, unfired pressure vessel, pipes or containers connected therewith, any engine, turbine, compressor, pump or wheel or any apparatus generating, transmitting or using electricity, or any other machine or apparatus connected with or operated by any of the previously named boilers, vessels or machines; and including the incidental power to make inspections of and to issue certificates of inspection upon, any such boilers, apparatus and machinery, whether insured or otherwise; (f) against loss by burglary or theft, or both, and against loss of or damage to moneys and securities; (g) to guarantee and identify merchants, traders, and those engaged in business and giving credit, from loss and damage by reason of giving and extending credit to their customers and those dealing with them; (h) against loss or damage by water or other fluid or substance to any property resulting from the breakage or leakage of sprinklers or water pipes; (i) to insure against any other casualty risk which may lawfully be the subject of insurance, and which it is not contrary to public policy to insure: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as having any effect whatever upon the right or authority of any solvent company to make contracts of fidelity or surety."

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, the first amendment deals with page 18, line 20 of the bill. That is subsection 2 of section 11. There is a later proposed amendment which deals with the matter appearing on page 37, line 2 of the bill. I submit a proposed amendment which in due course I shall offer, and I should like section 27 as thus rewritten to appear in the same way; and I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

On page 37, line 2, strike out after the word "which" the remainder of line 2 and all of line 3 and insert "does not comply with the requirements of the law of the District: Provided, That such action of the Superintendent shall be subject to review under the provisions of section 45."

Or, stated with stricken language in brackets and new matter in italics, as follows:

"SEC. 27. Policy forms filed with the Superintendent: The Superintendent may require that all policy forms used by every authorized company covering risks in the District be filed with the Superintendent. The Superintendent shall have authority to disapprove the use in the District of any policy form which [in his opinion is illegal, inequitable, or contrary to public interests] does not comply with the requirement of the laws of the District: Provided, That such action of the Superintendent shall be subject to review under the provisions of section 45."

Mr. DANAHER. Briefly discussing the proposed changes, Mr. President, let me say that I am heartily in favor of the principle and of the objectives sought for by this bill; but the section known as subsection (2) of section 11, appearing on page 18 and commencing at line 20, provides that casualty insurance may be written upon the health of persons or against injury, disablement, or death of persons resulting from traveling or general accidents by land or water, and against liability of the assured for injuries to employees or other persons. One of the proposed changes that I submit is to include, immediately thereafter, additional language to provide for insurance against liability of the assured for loss or destruction of or damage to property. Obviously, one of the major phases of casualty underwriting today deals with property-damage insurance; and yet all of this section which purported to deal with casualty permissive lines had wholly failed to make specific reference to that very important subject.

With that thought in mind, I therefore have incorporated the proposed language in the amendment as submitted.

On page 18, in line 25, there is reference to breakage insurance, and the language reads:

Upon plate glass against breakage.

That language so markedly limits existing insurance contracts that, in the first place, the mere statement of it will indicate why it should be corrected. Much glass is not plate glass at all. Many phases of insurance apply against other losses than that occurring from breakage, such, for example, as will be caused by acids or by scratches. Therefore, insurance to extend to all phases of damage to glass is what should be covered and should be permitted. With that in mind I submitted language which would strike out the existing language and permit insurance "against loss of or damage to glass and its appurtenances."

On page 18, line 25, running over to page 19, line 3, the bill deals with boiler and machinery insurance. As it reads, once more we find that the language definitely delimits the common and ordinary business of insurance, for the simple reason that as it reads we find that it is upon boilers, without defining what boilers are, against explosions. Yet there may be losses of many kinds besides those from explosions. The bill proceeds to provide "against loss or damage to life or property resulting therefrom." So I would suggest that we strike out subclause "(d)" and insert instead the language:

(e) against loss of or damage to any property resulting from the explosion of or injury to any boiler, heater, unfired pressure vessel, pipes or containers connected therewith, any engine, turbine, compressor, pump, or wheel, or any apparatus generating, transmitting, or using electricity, or any other machine or apparatus connected with or operated by any of the previously named boilers, vessels, or machines; and including the incidental power to make inspections of and to issue certificates of inspection upon, any such boilers, apparatus, and machinery, whether insured or otherwise.

I think I should point out that the proposed language as I offer it is almost exactly the wording of the present New York law. In New York, as every one of us knows, where there is a very great industrial population, with a vast amount of machinery of every sort, there has been worked out of their vast experience a law of much value. The New York law has made provisions for the fact that a very considerable portion of boiler losses comes from cracking, as distinguished from mere explosions, which the particular language in the pending bill to which I have referred would cover. There are so many reasons justifying the proposed change that I desired to set my entire thought forth, so that the Senators on the District Committee would have it before them when they considered the amendment.

I have no doubt that the proposed bill intended to refer to boiler insurance as such, but there is more than that to it, in view of the provision "against loss or damage to life or property resulting therefrom." Since we have already in the first sentence of the subsection dealt with injury to persons, it would seem proper to omit it in the language of the proposed amendment, and, with that thought in mind, it has been so omitted.

On page 19, line 3, again, because of the necessity for change as indicated by the amendment already submitted as to property damage, we would have to reletter the section by striking out "(e)" and inserting "(f)."

On page 19, line 4, we find that the proposed code would provide for insurance "against loss by burglary or theft, or both." There are more forms of insurance on moneys and other securities than would be covered merely by the description "burglary" or "theft." Consequently it would seem to me that after the word "both," in line 4, we should insert "and against loss of or damage to moneys and securities." In that way it would be possible to insure in the District against loss of or damage to moneys, valuable papers, and documents, whatever the cause of the loss may be, not necessarily burglary or theft.

I have also made provision on page 19 for a new section to deal with insurance against loss or damage by water or other fluid or substance to any property, resulting from the breakage or leakage of sprinklers or water pipes. I do not suppose I need elaborate upon such a highly salutary provision. It is a common form of insurance. Yet the bill as drafted, and as it has already passed the House, I might say, wholly fails to cover the points to which I am now making reference. With these thoughts I think my colleagues upon study will find that there is ample reason and justification for the change.

If we turn to page 36 of the bill, line 22, we find that the section entitled "section 27" now reads:

The Superintendent may require that all policy forms used by every authorized company covering risks in the District be filed with the Superintendent. The Superintendent shall have authority to disapprove the use in the District of any policy form—

Now notice this language—which in his opinion is illegal, inequitable, or contrary to public interests.

There is a most unusual delegation of authority to the Superintendent in that particular. My second amendment, already submitted, would strike out from line 2, on page 37, the language after the word "which," as follows, "in his opinion is illegal, inequitable, or contrary to public interests", and insert new language, so that the section would read:

The Superintendent may require that all policy forms used by every authorized company covering risks in the District be filed with the Superintendent. The Superintendent shall have authority to disapprove the use in the District of any policy form which does not comply with the requirements of the law of the District: Provided, That such action of the Superintendent shall be subject to review under the provisions of section 45.

Mr. President, we would transfer by that language the mere matter of an untrammelled discretion from the operating mental processes of the superintendent to a standard which is fixed by law. Then the superintendent would be the judge as to whether or not a given policy form does or does not comply with the requirements of law. If he says it does not, and if any one is aggrieved thereby, there is no reason why he should not have a right of appeal.

As a matter of fact, section 45 of the bill does provide:

> Any person affected by an order, ruling, proceeding, or action of the Superintendent, or any person acting in his behalf and at his instance, may contest the validity of the same in any court of competent jurisdiction through any appropriate proceedings. In said proceedings and appeals. * * *

Obviously by that language it clearly was contemplated that appeals would lie. Appropriate proceedings therefore will include appeals. Consequently I do no more in the proposed amendment to section 27 than to say that an appeal will lie in accordance with the provisions of the machinery set up in section 45 to deal with appeals.

I am sure that with these minor but I think salutary changes the work of the District Commissioners in this particular may go forward apace, and the Senators on the District Committee, in charge of the bill, will find that the recommended alterations are acceptable, and thereupon there will be no further objection on my part to immediate passage of the bill.

I will press for the amendments which I have sent to the desk, intended to be proposed by me at the time the bill is next called up by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

In addition to the notice I have just given, and the explanation, which I desired to have appear in the RECORD, I will also discuss the matter with the Senator in person, to the end that proceedings for the benefit of the District may be expedited in every way within my power.

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, already there has been such complete discussion of the pending bill that I hesitate to prolong debate even for the very brief statement which I am about to make.

As a man of peace, I believe the best way to avoid war in this day of unprovoked and undeclared war is to be prepared to wage war with vigor and success should any one or a combination of the international highwaymen now rampant in the world wage war upon us.' "Forewarned is forearmed," and "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

As I go back and forth across the continent from my home in Oregon to this, the Nation's Capital, I am impressed with the great wealth which we Americans as a nation have accumulated during the three centuries which have passed since the first colonial settlements were made.

Undoubtedly the covetous eyes of these international highwaymen of bankrupt nations look longingly to recoup themselves from the wealth of such a land as ours.

It seems to me that we should profit from the experience of peaceful China, of defenseless Abyssinia, of helpless Holland, Norway, and other nations, which were at peace with their neighbors and which are now being destroyed and subdued because of the lust for power on the part of the dictators of the world and the inability of the unarmed and unprepared nations successfully to repel the invaders of their homelands.

As a member of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs I have not studied nor been influenced by the Gallup polls or by the opinions of other guessers and gossips, but I have conferred with those official authorities upon whom we must depend if war should be forced upon us. I have conferred with the commanding generals of our Army and with the military authorities available to me as a Senator and as a member of the Military Affairs Committee. From their expert knowledge and expressed opinions I am convinced that we should provide an army of sufficient size and mobility, equipped with the most modern arms and matériel of all kinds, to make it extremely unlikely that any aggressor should attempt to invade us to possess themselves of the great wealth and resources of our country and to overwhelm and enslave our people. If we prepare, and prepare in time, and thereby avoid the destruction and the devastation resulting from wars, our efficient action now will be justified. I believe that if we do not do it, we shall lay ourselves open to attack.

General Marshall's testimony before the Senate Military Affairs Committee for the need for this legislation has been interpreted quite differently by different Senators—each to support his own point of view. The General's meaning to me is so clear, urgent, and convincing that I quote it verbatim from the record of the hearings:

> General MARSHALL. We have to have a great many men quickly, and I cannot conceive of being able to obtain them on any voluntary basis. Besides that, that isn't a democratic procedure, I do not think. And it certainly isn't a scientific basis. And it leaves us in a position of uncertainty regarding most of the things we do.
> An army capable of defending this country must be built in an orderly and businesslike manner.
>
> Raising an army by voluntary enlistment at best is a hit-or-miss method. Compulsory service is the only certain method of raising the men when required.
>
> We must know that men will be available when they are required. I would like to emphasize that "when," and in the numbers required for each step of an orderly procedure.
>
> We have already lost precious weeks. Each day of further delay is a day lost that cannot be replaced.
> Men are needed at the earliest possible moment, in my opinion, in the opinion of the War Department. The voluntary system cannot produce them with the rapidity which the present world situation demands and cannot produce them in the total numbers required at the present time. * * * We have to have men and have them quickly.

I ask those who recommend no preparedness, or that no action be taken in conformity with the recommendations of the military experts—I ask those who oppose this preparedness program if they themselves have locks on the doors of their houses and bars on the windows of their homes and of their places of business, and if so, why do they have those locks and bars? Did any one of them see any burglar this morning? Did any one of them see a highwayman in his garden or clambering into his house? Why do they have the locks and bars on their doors and windows?

A mobile, well-equipped United States Army is the "policeman on the corner" for our rich Nation, and for the preservation of the lives and homes of our people.

In line with this thought, not only have I gone to the military experts for guidance, but it is my custom on many occasions to go back to the Bible, or to Aesop, or to Benjamin Franklin, whose wisdom seems to have been good through all the centuries that people have been looking to them for wisdom. I find in Aesop the fable of the wild boar and the fox, as follows:

> A wild boar was whetting his tusks against a tree when a fox, coming by, asked why he did so. "For," said he, "I see no reason for it. There is neither hunter nor hound in sight, nor any other danger—that I can see—at hand." "True," replied the boar, "but when that danger does arrive I shall have something else to do than to sharpen my weapons."
> It is too late to whet the sword when the trumpet sounds to draw it.

I particularly desire to call to the attention of the Senate and to emphasize the language of the bill which directs that an opportunity for voluntary enlistments shall be afforded to any person between the ages of 18 and 35 years. The exact language of the bill reads as follows:

> Provided, That any person between the ages of 18 and 35 shall be afforded an opportunity voluntarily to enlist and be inducted into the land or naval forces of the United States for the training and service prescribed in subsection (b), if he is acceptable to the land or naval forces for such training and service.

Without compulsory registration and selective conscription of the manpower of our Nation for military training and service, which has its advantages to the recruit as well as its disadvantages, only the patriotic citizens are called. The citizens who shirk civic duties on every occasion but who frequently foment disorders and domestic trouble escape the military obligations of citizenship if there is no fair draft law.

Mr. President, I have not counted the number of postal cards and letters I have received pro and con on this question, but I have sought for intelligent contributions of thought. I do not believe that wisdom can be found in quantity. I am a great believer in quality. I believe that this is a republic, a government by the chosen representatives of the people, and that we should on all questions endeavor to learn the part of wisdom and to exercise that wisdom regardless of whether at the moment our action may be popular or unpopular. We must lead and follow. We should not go around with our ears to the ground hunting for the groundswell of immature popular and temporary opinion. Ours is a position of responsibility and we must assume that responsibility and bear its burdens.

Amongst the letters I have received is one which came in yesterday's mail, which is encouraging to me. It is from one of the great patriots of Oregon. I ask that, without reading it, it may be incorporated in the RECORD as part of my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., August 9, 1940.

Hon. RUFUS C. HOLMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HOLMAN: Please accept my congratulations on your stand on the proposed selective service law. I consider your vote in committee as just and courageous on this important legislation and am surprised to read there is so much opposition, politically and otherwise, apparently based upon the idea of first trying to get enlistments under the volunteer system.

As a member of local war board under the selective-service law of 1917–18, I found this law worked both practically and satisfactorily. The fairness of registration, classification, and selection appealed to the boys and we had no complaints from them and the enlistments produced the least interference with business and domestic life. It was scientific and orderly and only those registrants who were classified in A 1 class were subject to draft.

On the other hand, the practical workings of the volunteer system were unfair and many boys were enlisted who would not have been subject to the draft, as their classification would put them in a deferred class. Many of such boys were swept into the ranks through emotional excitement and propaganda on the part of the enlisting authorities and others joined through an idea of being embarrassed by being called a slacker if they did not enlist.

You have appropriated large sums of money providing for war equipment in the national defense, but as is generally known, you must also have adequate seasoned and well-trained manpower to use this equipment and I am very much in favor of what is known as the selective service law or conscription.

I wish you every success in your stand in this matter.

With kind regards and best wishes for your good health.

Sincerely,

RUSSELL E. SEWALL.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, in conclusion I shall quote two paragraphs from a recent article by the newly appointed Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Patterson, to which I subscribe:

The principal objection to voluntary enlistment, however, is that it is undemocratic. In return for equal rights and equal privileges, a democracy demands of its citizens equal duties and equal sacrifices. The obligation to defend America falls with impartial justice upon every citizen.

Voluntary enlistment places the burden upon the patriotic few. Compulsory military training extends it to all. It is the democratic way.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, AUGUST 13, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., pastor of Gunton Temple Memorial Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, grant that during this day we may be conscious of being engaged in the business of the King of Kings and feel that it is of imperial and eternal concern.

In the discharge of all our duties may we have fortitude and faith. May we hallow Thy name in high ideals and heroic endeavors after righteousness. Sustain us in loyalty to every lofty vision.

We pray that we may be of that company of brave and noble souls who are seeking to minister to those for whom life is hard. Enrich our minds and hearts with compassion and good will. Show us how we may set men free from those burdens which lie so heavily upon our humanity in these strange and troubled times.

To Thy name shall be all the praise. Amen.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I have always had great confidence in the final judgment of the people. I have contended on numerous occasions on the floor of this House that the youth of the country was being misled by the leadership that was provided for them. I have always contended that young people who could see dignity in labor still had an opportunity in America, but the leadership of various youth groups and the material supplied them was contending differently.

Now, to my complete satisfaction, the American Youth Commission, a private research organization, gives the Associated Press a statement declaring that unemployment is higher among youths than among any other group. The Commission finds that these young people have been led by their leaders and their studies to believe that the only careers for youth lies in "white collar" jobs.

The report makes it clear that the hopes fostered by the present educational system have been most disappointing, and they call for radical changes and more honest leadership. They declare, as many of us have always known, that labor is the lot of men and that the solution to many of our problems will be found in the return to the early educational laws of the American Colonies, which provided that the parents should give their children training in some useful occupation. I rejoice in the thought that we are going to have new leadership in the Government and it will not be long until back to work we go. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

INDUSTRY MUST TAKE CHARGE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. "Industry must take charge," says A. D. Whiteside, president of Dun & Bradstreet:

If the Government continues to run into debt it will have to confiscate capital. Industry can stand up about 10 years before becoming engulfed by inflation. It is up to industry itself to take charge of the situation, since the Government's program has been accepted by the country and even a change in administration would not halt the forces that have been set in motion.

I want to say here that we are going to have an election in November. Industry is not going to have to take charge, because we are going to elect a President in November, Wendell Willkie, who is going to see that industry and agriculture in this country gives employment to the 9,000,000 unemployed which this administration for the last 10 years has tried to put back to work unsuccessfully. The fact of the matter is we have more and more unemployment all the time under the New Deal. We have more distress, more deficit, more regimentation—American liberty is fast getting away. Let us preserve America and her liberties. When we inaugurate Wendell Willkie as President he will provide such encouragement to the American people that industry and agriculture will thrive, the American people will go back to work in industry and agriculture and then we will have happy and contented citizens in this country and they will not have to ask for relief from any New Deal any longer. What a great need for an American at this time. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BENDER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

REGULATION OF INVESTMENT COMPANIES AND INVESTMENT ADVISERS

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, by authority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 10065) to provide for the registration and regulation of investment companies and investment advisers, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment, and agree to the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 182, after line 13, insert:

"TITLE III—AMENDMENT OF SECURITIES ACT OF 1933

"SEC. 301. Section 8 (a) of the Securities Act of 1933, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

" 'SEC. 8. (a) Except as hereinafter provided, the effective date of a registration statement shall be the twentieth day after the filing thereof or such earlier date as the Commission may determine, having due regard to the adequacy of the information respecting the issuer theretofore available to the public, to the facility with which the nature of the securities to be registered, their relationship to the capital structure of the issuer and the rights of holders thereof can be understood, and to the public interest and the protection of investors. If any amendment to any such statement is filed prior to the effective date of such statement, the registration statement shall be deemed to have been filed when such amendment was filed; except that an amendment filed with the consent of the Commission, prior to the effective date of the registration statement, or filed pursuant to an order of the Commission, shall be treated as a part of the registration statement.' "

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of the amendment which was approved by the Senate to the investment trust bill, I want to explain briefly what it accomplishes.

The bill was accepted by the Senate identically as it passed the House with the exception of the one amendment which we have asked the House to agree to.

In section 8 (a) of the Securities Act of 1933 there is a provision that all registrations shall wait a period of 20 days before becoming effective. There has been considerable discussion of this provision. The Commission, with the joint help of the industry—and when I say industry I mean the National Association of Securities Dealers and the Investment Bankers Association of America—have all got together and recommended a relaxation of the rigid rule under which the Commission is now required to function, so that in the future registrations, if the Commission so decides, may become effective in less than the 20-day period now called for under the law.

I am sure most of the Members of the House who are interested in this subject are familiar with section 8 (a), which we are now amending. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point a letter dated August 1, 1940, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and signed by the Acting Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, Judge Healy, Mr. Francis A. Bonner, chairman of the National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc., and Emmett F. Connely, president of the Investment Bankers Association of America, setting forth their approval and advocacy of the amendment now before us; and also a letter from the Commission dated August 7, 1940, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, approving the bill H. R. 10276, a bill introduced by Chairman LEA, which is identical in language with the amendment approved by the Senate to H. R. 10065. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to insert these letters at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to follow:

SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION,
Washington, August 1, 1940.

The Honorable CLARENCE F. LEA,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LEA: The Securities and Exchange Commission, in conjunction with representatives of the National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc., and the Investment Bankers Association, suggests the enclosed modification of section 8 (a) of the Securities Act of 1933, as amended, for the consideration of the Congress and respectfully urges that it may be enacted at the present session.

The Commission and the representatives of the National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc., and the Investment Bankers Association wish to make it clear to the Members of the Congress that this proposal is experimental. They have already agreed to present to Congress in January their joint and several views as to modifications of this statute, based on study and conferences to be conducted in the meantime. They all, therefore, expressly wish to reserve the right to make, at that time, any further suggestions for the modification of section 8 (a) which they may believe to be desirable.

The representatives of the National Association of Securities Dealers and the Investment Bankers Association express the view that the proposed amendment should be helpful, although not a complete solution of the problem. They, therefore, intend in January to make suggestions for further changes in this section as well as in other sections of the act, but in order to make it possible to shorten the time in which securities may be registered and offered, they join in the request that this single amendment be enacted into law at the earliest possible moment during the present session of Congress.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT E. HEALY,
Acting Chairman, Securities and Exchange Commission.
FRANCIS A. BONNER,
Chairman, National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc.
EMMETT F. CONNELY,
President, Investment Bankers Association of America.

SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION,
Washington, August 7, 1940.

Hon. CLARENCE F. LEA,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Room 1334, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LEA: I have your letter of August 2, 1940, enclosing a copy of H. R. 10276, a bill to amend section 8 (a) of the Securities Act of 1933.

In replying to the request of your committee for comment thereon, I should like first to refer to the joint statement of the Commission, the National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc., and the Investment Bankers Association. That statement urged the enactment of the provisions embodied in H. R. 10276 as an immediate amendment, subject to review during the forthcoming discussions of further amendments to the Securities Act which are to take place prior to the next Congress. As you will remember, a copy of this statement was forwarded to you under date of August 1, 1940.

In the course of its administration of the Securities Act of 1933, the Commission believes that in many, although not all, cases it can adequately examine registration statements in substantially less than 20 days, which, under section 8 (a) as it now stands, must elapse before a registration statement can become effective. In the case of certain registrants there would normally seem to be little risk to the investing public if their registration statements were to become effective prior to the expiration of the present statutory waiting period. The bill is so phrased as to assure that the Commission's power to accelerate registration statements filed by such registrants may not be exercised except where adequate protection is afforded to the investing public.

It was on this basis that we reached the conclusion set forth in the joint statement referred to above that the amendment embodied in H. R. 10276 should, if possible, be enacted at the present session of Congress.

If there is any other way in which the Commission can be of assistance to your committee, I hope that you will not hesitate to call upon us.

Sincerely yours,

JEROME N. FRANK, Chairman.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, whose splendid work as a member of this subcommittee is so generally recognized.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. I have asked the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] to yield in order that I may emphasize the fact that this proposed amendment to the bill, which we passed a few days ago, has been recommended and agreed to by the Securities and Exchange Commission and by the representatives of the National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc., and the Investment Bankers Association of America.

This agreement between the regulatory body and those to be regulated, arising from a cooperative effort to provide a workable act, again emphasizes the importance of the work done by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] in bringing together representatives of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the investment industry in order that a better understanding might exist. The result is better legislation. This proposed amendment which has been agreed upon by all interested parties is additional evidence of the good that can be accomplished by such a course. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] deserves great credit for his accomplishment in this respect. It would be helpful if this course was followed by other Government regulatory bodies. In this connection may I make reference to an editorial which appears today in the New York Herald Tribune, entitled "Attacking Another Bottleneck." It reads as follows:

ATTACKING ANOTHER BOTTLENECK

When the Senate voted favorably at the end of last week on the Wagner bill for the regulation of the investment-trust industry it simultaneously approved a rider to that measure modifying the must-discussed 20-day clause of the Securities Act of 1933. Since the trust bill itself has already been passed upon by the House, all that is now required is the latter's approval of the rider, and no difficulty seems to be looked for on this score. It seems probable, therefore, that both the bill and the rider will become law within the next few days.

Sometime ago, in referring to the manner in which the investment-trust bill has been worked out, we spoke of it as an example of what could be accomplished when representatives of the Government and business sat down together and approached a problem in a spirit of reasonableness and full recognition of the public interest. This measure still stands as perhaps the high point of such cooperation between Washington, the regulator, and Wall Street, the regulated. But to a considerable degree what is true of the trust bill itself in this respect is also true of the proposal which it now carries for relaxing the terms of the 20-day clause. In nearly every bill of particulars that has been filed by its critics against the Securities Act this clause has invariably stood at, or very near, the top.

The 20-day clause is the section of the Securities Act which provides that there must be a waiting period of that duration between the time a company files its statement registering a new security issue with the Securities and Exchange Commission and the effective date when the issue may be offered for public sale. The principal purpose of this provision of the law was to give the public an opportunity to familiarize itself with the material in the registration statement. But although an underwriter is permitted to give out information concerning a registered security during this so-called incubation period, the danger that providing such information might be legally construed as an attempt to sell has tended to discourage such activities. Thus, to a very considerable degree the law has tended to defeat its own ends. At the same time—what is more important from the bankers' point of view—it has added a very formidable hazard to the underwriting and distributing, as well as the issuing, of securities.

The legislation just approved does not repeal the 20-day clause, but it does make it decidedly more flexible. It says that the effective date in the future shall be the twentieth day, "or such earlier date as the Commission may determine." In waiving or reducing the period the Commission must first give consideration to the adequacy of information concerning the issues already available, the nature of the security and its relation to the capital structure, and "the public interest generally." It is true that the measure adds new discretionary powers to the long list already held by the Commission, but in the present situation this is probably inherent in the nature of things. There is no doubt that in assuming these new responsibilities the Commission has it in its power to remove one of the most serious bottlenecks in the new issues market and thus, in turn, in the Nation's defense program.

The editorial which I have just read indicates clearly there is substantial reason for the adoption of this amendment, and I trust it will have the support of the House.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I read this morning the editorial to which the gentleman from New Jersey refers and has partly read, from the New York Tribune of this morning, and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may insert the whole editorial instead of just the part he read, because coming from the New York Tribune it is doubly complimentary to this great agency of the Federal Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. I recollect that this provision that we are aiming to repeal or modify was inserted for the purpose of protecting investors, because in the years before the stock exchanges were extremely reckless and would permit the listing of almost any kind of stock. The investors had no protection, had no knowledge or information whether the securities that were listed and unloaded on the public were sound and safe. I recall that the Majority Leader as well as the gentleman from Maryland and other members of the committee thought that that protection was due to the American investors. Nevertheless, I realize that the invesment bankers and others have been complaining that this would delay their putting on the market their new securities. I am indeed gratified to learn that the outstanding Republican newspapers today give the Democratic Party credit for real constructive legislation, and that we are willing and ready to do anything and everything to appease the objectors; I trust, however, that this will not be abused on the part of the stock exchanges, nor by the investment bankers, because if it is abused I serve notice now that I shall start again to demand still stricter restrictions than we have today.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman will find that all of the safeguards in which he is interested are still retained in this bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, there is no clause in the Securities Act, as Members of the House who were here at the time it was passed will recall, that caused more controversy than this one thing and there was no abuse in the country that was more necessary to correct than that which we sought to correct by this 20-day clause. And may I say to the gentleman from Illinois that this is not a repeal of the 20-day clause. That clause remains in the statute. This simply gives the Commission authority to relax the 20-day clause if, under the circumstances, they think it wise and in the public interest to do so. I am certain that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce would not at this time recommend the repeal in toto of the clause, but they are acting in this capacity simply to give the Commission authority to relax the rigidity of the clause.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. SABATH. This gives the Commission that power, and naturally they will use the power whenever they feel that conditions warrant it, and I hope it will not be abused by the Commission. I have the utmost confidence in the Commission today.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was agreed to was laid on the table.

PROVIDING HOMESTEADS FOR ACTUAL FARM FAMILIES

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 406, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 406

AUTHORIZING THE PRESIDENT TO ORDER MEMBERS AND UNITS OF RESERVE COMPONENTS AND RETIRED PERSONNEL OF THE REGULAR ARMY INTO ACTIVE MILITARY SERVICE

Mr. SMITH of Virginia, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged report (Rept. No. 2848, H. Res. 567), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 567

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 286, a joint resolution to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of Reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks regarding the so-called conscription bill, and to insert some letters from constituents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] is recognized.

NATIONAL LAND POLICY

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the pending resolution proposes to make in order H. R. 8157, which is known as the Peterson homestead bill.

This bill is what has evolved out of the discussion that has been running along from time to time in this House for some number of years now on the original Peterson bill. The measure which it is proposed by this rule to make in order is, in my judgment, very much of an improvement on the original bill, and certainly merits serious consideration by the membership of this body.

I want to say to you, however, that I fear the rule is going to be rejected. I hope that it is not. I hope the membership sees fit to adopt the rule and let the bill be debated, because I would like for you to have the benefit of the statement which my colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PETERSON], is prepared to make. He has probably given more study to this particular subject, and I think probably knows more about it, than any other Member of this body. By that I do not mean to detract in the slightest from the very great ability of the chairman of your Committee on Agriculture or any other member of that committee. I think it is one of the finest committees of the House.

The Committee on Agriculture is probably against this bill. It may be that the committee has not been able to see the merits of the proposal. Maybe it feels that it stands in the way of a measure that they are advocating, which has been heard by the Rules Committee on an application for a rule. Just why the committee is against it I do not know. It may be that on the application for a rule on the Peterson bill things were said that gave offense. I hope not. The bill of the Agriculture Committee proposes to amend the Farm Security Act. They have been waiting patiently for action on the part of the Rules Committee for some time. Possibly they have become discouraged. I hope not, because it is my belief that that committee will give them a rule. While I have not canvassed the committee, I have that feeling and that it will do so at an early moment.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Is the bill just referred to the one that expands a considerable amount the activity under the Bankhead-Jones Act?

Mr. COX. Yes; and somewhat modifies the law. I think the bill that the committee is pressing is very much of an improvement upon existing law.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I have a great deal of confidence in the judgment of the gentleman from Georgia. I am sure he has given this bill a considerable amount of study. Is he advocating the passage of this particular measure at the present time?

Mr. COX. I think the bill, amended in some respects, as I am assured the author of the bill is prepared to advocate, if enacted into law, could be made to work with a great degree of satisfaction to those who may be expected to benefit under the measure. I grant you that it is somewhat of an ambitious proposal, yet not nearly so much so as was the original bill. It is sound. It certainly does not involve the slightest loss to the Government; that is, if administered with discretion; and, of course, the Appropriations Committee, after all, has a check on it, and no money can be used except that which is appropriated, and I think we could confidently expect that committee to exercise sound judgment in the setting up of the funds to be used in the carrying on of the proposed activity.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN].

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that a measure of this magnitude should come before the House without hearings and without due consideration. The measure no doubt has its merits and is demanded by certain Members of Congress and possibly by certain individuals in this country; but so far I have been unable to find any hearing in which even the proponent or the author of the bill urges its passage.

I want to briefly explain just what the bill attempts to do. In the first place, the bill provides for a duplication of service already engaged in by the United States Government. It comes into direct conflict with the Farm Credit Administration, the Farm Security Administration, and other agencies that are now engaged in providing homes for the farmers of this country; to set up a new agency in the Department of the Interior which may cost, if administered, according to the intent of the author of the bill, from five to ten billion dollars.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am sorry I cannot yield just now. The gentleman will have time. The bill provides——

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. It provides a new agency to be set up under the terms of the bill.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am sorry I cannot yield. The gentleman can explain that in his own time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, the bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior may purchase any piece of farm land that has a mortgage on it, or that has had a mortgage on it since 1920, if the mortgagee is still in possession of the title of that land. I have not made any calculation as to the amount it would take to buy all the farm lands that have been mortgaged or foreclosed on since 1920, but, if I am not mistaken, it would run close to $10,000,000,000 or more.

It may seem to some as it does to me that it is a measure particularly designed to permit holders of foreclosed properties or mortgages to unload them on the Federal Government, because it does give every holder of a mortgage the opportunity to sell that mortgage to the Secretary of the Interior. So when it is said that the administration of this bill will not cost the Government anything, such statement is wholly erroneous, for the Secretary of the Interior will not be able to function unless he carries out the intent of the bill, and in order to do this he must have money from the Treasury of the United States.

The Federal Government is now engaged in lending money to farmers. The Farm Credit Administration has lent money to more than 600,000 farm-land borrowers. At the present time 180,000 of these 600,000 are delinquent in the payment of principal and interest they owe the Farm Credit Administration. These farms are all subject to foreclosure.

Since March 4, 1933, the Farm Credit Administration has foreclosed on more than 84,000 farms, and if they are to exercise their duties under the law as the law now is written they must foreclose on all the 180,000 farmers who owe money to the United States and are delinquent.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I cannot yield.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Does not this bill——

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The reason the Federal Government has foreclosed on nearly 85,000 farms and taken them away from the farm owners is due to the fact that no system or policy has been provided whereby the farmers can get a decent income for the things they have to sell. Insufficient income has placed the indebted farmers in a position so that they cannot meet their obligations either to the Federal Government or to private parties. The mortgages have therefore become delinquent. While this bill seeks to remedy that situation I cannot see that it will do so because the farmer who secures a farm under this bill is obligated to repay that mortgage in 40 annual payments with about the same rate of interest that the farmers are now paying on their Federal-landbank mortgages. The bill states that the farmers shall pay the rate of interest that the Government must pay when it secures the money. If a farmer is unable to meet his obligation to the Federal Government under a mortgage to the Federal land bank, how in the name of common sense can he meet a mortgage obligation under the set-up provided in this bill which requires the payment at about the same rate of interest and installment payments on the principal similar to that required by the Farm Credit Administration.

What we must do now if we are to make farm owners out of farm tenants is to provide legislative policies that will give farmers an income so they can meet their obligations and still live as American citizens rather than continue a policy of low incomes which will eventually mean the destruction of our entire system. [Applause.]

A lot of people who hold mortgages would like to sell them to Mr. Ickes: The insurance companies, the banks, and private individuals. This bill gives them an opportunity to unload their mortgages, because the Secretary of the Interior under its provisions has direct authority to purchase, and is directed to purchase, those mortgages from the holders thereof.

The bill does not provide that he is to buy this mortgaged land or the mortgages all over the United States, but he can go into one county of one State and spend every penny of money authorized by this bill, which is unlimited, and only take care of one particular section. I think a bill of this magnitude should have some serious consideration by the committee before it is passed upon by Congress.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield.

Mr. Speaker, the bill originally came to the Committee on Agriculture. We gave the gentleman from Georgia a hearing. He stated his case, but the majority of the members of the committee felt that this was not a proper time to enact legislation of this character in view of other laws now upon the statute books which seek to remedy the farm-tenant situation.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman from Georgia proceeded to withdraw his bill from our committee and reintroduce it in somewhat different form so that the Committee on Public Lands would have jurisdiction over it. There should be complete hearings and a full discussion of all of the provisions of this bill instead of having to waste our time here today on a measure as far-reaching as this. It occurs to me that not only may we be doing the Treasury an injustice to pass this bill but also we would be doing the people of the country an injustice, for they will be led to believe that they can get homestead farms under this bill, and I cannot conceive that the Committee on Appropriations will ever appropriate any money whatsoever with as loose jurisdiction as is provided by the provisions of the bill.

Therefore, I recommend that the rule be defeated and that the bill go back to the committee for full and complete hearings, so that the membership of the House may at least know what the author has in mind and what the proponents of the legislation want the Federal Government to do in connection with legislation of this character. The bill has some merit, but let us study it, let us vote down the rule so that we can give all Members every opportunity to consider it in detail. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly the author of this bill is sincere in his feeling that it would accomplish a great purpose. In the last 6 years this administration has embarked on what the Committee on Agriculture thinks has been an intelligent approach to the farm problem and farm-tenancy problems. An effort has been made to conserve our natural resources, to conserve our soil, and to consider farming as an intelligently long-range planned industry.

If all the financial impediments to the working of this bill could be straightened out, if all the details of administration could be straightened out, I still would oppose this measure, because it accepts the philosophy of giving a man not an agricultural unit on which he can make payments, support his family, and educate his children, but a certain definite number of acres, from 50 to 160 acres. Under the philosophy of this bill if a farmer failed to make it on 200 acres and had to be foreclosed, the 200 acres could easily be divided into 50-acre tracts and then they could say to the man, "You could not make it on 200 acres; now we will give you 50 acres so you can change your standard of living and barely eke out an existence with this patch-farming system."

The whole western part of the United States is covered with monuments to the failure of the homestead system. One hundred and sixty acres were granted because that was a definite number of acres, and it would make the land go farther. The Kincaid plan failed in Nebraska and left as its monument old windmills, broken-down sheds, old houses, and broken-hearted homesteaders who had to move off the land because they could not possibly make a living on 160 acres. We have to pitch any tenant-farm program we have on an economic farming unit, whether it be 40 acres of irrigated land or 1,000 acres of grassland.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. What does the gentleman think would happen to the Western States and to their towns and communities if all the land were to go into the public domain which could not be classified as suitable for farming in tracts of 160 acres or less?

Mr. FERGUSON. That is just the point I am trying to make, that we are just now, through the efforts of Government lending agencies and through the efforts of the Farm Security Administration, readjusting the mistakes that were made under the old homestead system. If we are going to give a man a chance to pay back the money spent to buy his farm, if we are going to give him a chance at the same time he is paying back that money to have a decent house to live in and to educate his children, we have to give him a business farm, a farm that will support enough cattle or raise enough wheat to allow him to make the payments that come due year after year. There are many areas in the West where 1,000 acres are the minimum unit on which a man can make the payments and support his family. If we follow this philosophy of patch-farming in small units on which a man could not possibly carry a self-supporting number of milk cows and livestock, we continue the share-cropper system, except that the farmer gets all the crop. We continue the cash-crop system which has been the real cause of so much distress in agriculture.

Three years ago Congress passed the Bankhead-Jones farm-tenant bill, and inaugurated a system of allowing the prospective buyer who must be a tenant farmer, with the advice and help of a committee of local farmers, to purchase his farm with the aid of Government credit over a 40-year period. This system is working. No Government lending institution has an equal record of repayment. Both the farms and tenants have been carefully selected. As a result, the delinquencies of payments as due in the whole United States is less than 2 percent. The main criticism of the Bankhead-Jones farm-tenancy program is the fact that it fails to reach a great enough number of qualified tenants. The Committee on Agriculture now has before the Rules Committee a bill to greatly extend and increase the number of farms that can be purchased. This bill also applies the F. H. A. system of guaranteed mortgages to the farm-tenancy program. No longer will we have to beg Congress each session for an appropriation to carry out the program. The Secretary of Agriculture working with the Secretary of the Treasury will guarantee the mortgages on the farms purchased by tenant farmers at a rate of 3 percent. The tenant must pay 4 percent, however, 1 percent going to insurance against losses and administration. This bill has been painstakingly and thoroughly explained to the Rules Committee, and I feel sure that that committee will grant a rule that will allow the extension of the present Bankhead-Jones farm-tenancy program.

In the short time allotted me I cannot go into all the "bugs" in this so-called Peterson bill before us now, nor all the merits of S. 1836, which has passed the Senate and is now before the Rules Committee, a bill to extend the operations of the Bankhead-Jones Act. I merely want to impress on the House we have an organization set up in every county, now functioning, now working well, to meet the farm-tenancy program. We also have this bill to extend its operations because 3 years have proven that it should be extended. I believe in our present system and, as I stated in the beginning of my remarks, if we had no program I would have to reproach this legislation because of the underlying philosophy that refuses to recognize the right of the farmer to buy a farm on which he can make a living, pay for the farm, and support his family with a decent standard of living.

With this in view, I advocate voting down this rule. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, there are some who complain that this bill has not been referred to the right committee. It was referred by the Speaker to our Committee on Public Lands. The Committee on Rules has O. K.'d that by giving us a rule to bring the bill before the House, so it seems to me there is no question that the bill was referred to the right committee.

Two years ago we in the Committee on Public Lands unanimously passed a similar bill, and it was discussed fairly and freely. We unanimously passed this bill some weeks ago. I am free to say here that I believe most of us who are on that committee come from agricultural districts. We believe that we understand what farming, what agriculture needs. We believe we understand what the farmers in our districts want. Possibly I should not say this on the floor of the House, but I know that a great many of the farmers in my district are not satisfied with the agricultural program that is being carried on. The Agricultural Committee has for years, I may say, had before it the cost of production bill but it has refused to bring it out on the floor of the House for consideration so that a record vote could be taken on that question. Now they come before us and say they are concerned about agriculture, that they are the friends of the farmer. The two gentlemen preceding me are going to vote against this rule which gives us a chance to discuss this agricultural bill, yet they say they are in favor of agriculture.

What is the issue here at this moment? There is only one issue on this rule and that is, are you going to give us a chance to present arguments for this bill for 4 hours? Will you meet us on that question? Will you meet us on that issue or are you afraid to give us 4 hours and hear us? If you are friends of the farmers, as you claim you are, and if you are in favor of agriculture, all that we ask is that you give us these 4 hours to present our side, and if you have arguments to show the fallacy, as you say, of this bill, here is your chance, but do not deny us an opportunity to present our side of it.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Under the proposed rule can this bill be amended?

Mr. HILL. As I understand it, yes. Is not that true?

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Absolutely.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. REES of Kansas. There has been some complaint here to the effect that your committee did not hold hearings on this bill.

Mr. HILL. We had full discussion in the committee and invited witnesses.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Did the Department of Agriculture and other departments of the Government appear before the committee?

Mr. HILL. The Department of the Interior sent up its report.

Mr. REES of Kansas. And did the various other organizations have a chance to be heard?

Mr. HILL. They had the opportunity. Whether they came up or not is immaterial. All that we ask of the Members of this House is an opportunity to present our side and have you refute our arguments if you want to or if you can, and that is the entire issue here.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I would also like to know if the committee gave the farm people a chance to be heard.

Mr. HILL. Yes; had they so desired.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman said that the Department of Agriculture sent up a report on the bill. What was their recommendation?

Mr. HILL. All that will come out in the discussion of the bill if you will give us a chance to discuss it.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. I have looked the so-called hearings over and I do not see a report from either the Department of the Interior or the Department of Agriculture on the bill.

Mr. HILL. There is a report from the Interior Department. But even so, would you not give us an opportunity to discuss this bill on the floor of the House? What are our duties here if we are not to discuss these matters? You say we have not the time and yet we adjourn frequently for 3 days over a week end. Yet you cannot give the farmers a chance to be heard on this matter or give those who are in favor of the farmers a chance to be heard. We hear a great deal these days nearing election time about love for the farmers and sympathy for their plight. Both parties have planks definitely promising relief for agriculture. Yet we will likely find in the vote now imminent that a substantial majority of the elected Representatives in the House will vote to refuse to permit even a discussion of this important and serious problem. "Consistency, thou art a jewel." I shall demand a record vote on this rule so that the voters may know how their servants here in the House stand on this domestic issue. I for one am willing at all times to vote my convictions and let the people know how I voted. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I have a difficult time in trying to convince the membership, and even the Speaker, of what State I am from. Let me repeat that I come from North Dakota and not South Dakota. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota is recognized for 4 minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURDICK. May I have order, please, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURDICK. It would be a matter of poor sportsmanship for this House to refuse to let us discuss this bill, and I do not believe the House is going to do that. I do not believe you are afraid to let us come in here and make an argument in favor of this measure.

I notice a lot of you are alarmed because it is going to cost a lot of money, but let me remind you that if it does cost a lot of money it ought not to make any difference to this Congress. This Seventy-sixth Congress has appropriated $29,000,000,000, and you did not have a cent of it, and they borrowed it from someone who did not have a cent of it, and they are going to pay interest for the next 75 years to somebody who did not have it to lend. That is your financial policy. So do not get excited if it costs $1,000,000,000 to help a few farmers get something to eat. [Applause.] You will not have to buy very much land, either. You will not have to go out and purchase land, because you already have it. The Government of the United States right now, in addition to the land they have sold in the last 24 months, has $116,000,000,000 invested in land that they own, and the insurance companies of America now have over $700,000,000 invested in this land that they would like to get rid of and let somebody use it. So if this bill only provides for a plan to bale out the Government and let the Government sell its own land back to its own citizens, that will be enough for a start.

Do not get excited that we are trying to go out and buy all the land in America. We have too much now. You will recall that the President came before Congress and asked permission to build up some sort of a bureau to handle this land they have taken away from the farmers. Just recall that out of 6,000,000 farmers nearly half of them have been changed from owners to tenants in the last 8 years. In 1880 only 25 percent of the farms in the United States were not farmed by the owners, and now 42 percent of all farmers in the United States are renters. If you allow this situation to continue long enough, it will be, as I think it is now, the most important question before the Congress of the United States. Just remember that the number of men who work on farms make up the unemployed to the extent of about one-third. About one-third of them in normal times find work on the farms, but when you foreclosed on these farms and have driven the owners out, and put them on relief, there was no chance for them to help the unemployed. Our first duty is to keep the farm owners we still have and put farm owners back that lost their farms, and give everybody who can till the soil a chance to do so. Do not back up now because you think you are going to spend $350,000,000, when you will vote blindly $29,000,000,000 in this Congress, without knowing where it is going to come from; and you do not care, either, do you? Twenty billion dollars for defense, and nobody here can tell me where the money is coming from.

I have noticed one peculiarity about debt. If you owe what you can be made to pay by the liquidation of all your assets, you are in a precarious position; if you owe more than that, and especially many times more, you are practically secure. No one will disturb you because they want you to pay out. I think that is the situation now as to our national debt. We owe so much now that we are practically secure. If the debtors demand payment, we will in all probability issue a new kind of indebtedness in exchange for the old, and proceed on our way unfettered by the worry of debt.

Only one Member of Congress dared to vote against appropriations for defense purposes, but when it comes to appropriating a pittance, in comparison with war appropriations, to reestablish farmers who have been foreclosed, these same Congressmen rise from all sections of the Chamber and shout "economy. We must stop spending." If the appropriation were for a useless warship no such sentiment would be manifested.

If this country cannot contrive some means by which our farmers may continue to live on the soil, I say to you that you are stripping the United States of the best defense it has. These men feed the Nation in time of peace, and in time of war they feed the people and the Army, and do most of the fighting. When we are casting about to find the best means of national defense we—at least some of us—turn at once to rebuild the farms, but the majority here in Congress are as afraid of assisting the farmer as they are of the yellow fever. They are so afraid that right now there is danger of defeating this rule and preventing us from even discussing this important bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I entertain a high regard for the author of this bill for the persistence and diligence with which he has promoted the bill ever since he has been a Member of Congress. I salute him for that effort, because I think he is genuinely sincere. I wish I could support the bill, but in my judgment it is simply taking the Government further in the wrong direction. Perhaps I ought to impeach my own incredibility at the outset by refreshing your memory with the fact that my record is pretty consistent on the farm-tenancy program, and for what has been done. This just multiplies that mistake, and I think the position of those of us who have consistently opposed it heretofore is being vindicated already. Let me read this rather interesting extract from Pearson and Allen's column from the Sunday Times-Herald:

TENANT FARMERS

Despite all the good intentions of Henry Wallace regarding the sharecropper and tenant farmer, the inside fact is that both have been increasing in numbers and decreasing in security, year by year. For anybody who wants to write another Grapes of Wrath there is more abundant material than ever.

It is not being shouted from the house tops, but between 1930 and 1935 the number of farm tenants increased at the rate of 40,000 a year to reach the staggering total of 2,865,000. The 1940 census, when the figures are out, is expected to show a still higher figure.

Privately Agriculture Department officials admit that they are just about licked, and have almost abandoned their drive to reduce tenantry.

There are three reasons for the increase in tenant farming:

1. Increased mechanization. Best index of this is the mounting sale of tractors. Technological unemployment, which long ago hit the factory, has now come to the farm.

2. Reduced acreage. To prevent price-depressing surpluses, A. A. A. contracts with farmers to plant less. This means fewer tenants are needed to plant, tend, and harvest the crops. Meantime, the rested land next year gives a higher yield, necessitates further acreage cuts.

3. In spite of A. A. A. efforts, however, tenants and sharecroppers are not getting proportional benefits of A. A. A. payments. The money goes to the landlords, many of whom are insurance companies and absentee owners. A. A. A. officials, headed by Cully Cobb, insist they can't make an issue of this.

SHARECROPPER SECURITY

Economists in the Department are now making a drive for security for tenants. This represents a radical shift of direction. For, until recently, the drive was to convert tenants to owners.

Instead, realizing that many tenants are incapable of owning and operating a farm, A. A. A. planners are not trying to decrease the number of tenants but to increase their income and security. It is pointed out that tenantry in England is much higher than in the United States (80 percent against 42) but that the English farm tenants have protection unknown here.

First step in this direction is to formalize and legalize the relation between farmer and tenant by bringing in a simple, uniform lease to bind the relation between them. Over 80 percent of all tenants and sharecroppers have only verbal agreements with their landlords.

Conferences in the Agriculture Department are preparing for such a drive. Preliminary material has been drawn up, under Economist Dover P. Trent. The country will soon hear about the "flexible farm lease."

I think that is a pretty adequate statement of the whole situation. Then why make the mistake of speculating on a bill that is full of foibles and fancies, that is basically wrong, and spend 4 hours on it that we could much better spend in a more improving effort? Why speculate on a bill of that kind? I think that is the answer to the thesis advanced by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL]. If an egg is rotten, there is no use spending 4 hours speculating on whether it is rotten or not. Let us have done with it first and last, and then resume much of the effort that lies over on the desk of every Member on other vital matters that await action on the floor. If I could be persuaded that this is going to do something for foreclosures, I might take a different attitude. Here is the report of the gentleman from Georgia himself and it gives you the story of what foreclosures are like, as taken from the Federal land bank report. In 1929 there were 3,350, and in 1939, after 8 years of salutary legislation what was the record? More than three times that much, namely 10,567. Those are not my figures. Those are figures submitted in the report by the author of this bill.

Look for a moment at the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation. It started in 1934. They had only 2 foreclosures then. In 1939 there were 5,502. Why should we make Uncle Sam the greatest real-estate broker in farm lands in all the wide world, give him a chance to acquire by purchase of liens every encumbered farm in this Nation and then reclassify the land and sell it back on a 40-year basis, when the record of the department and the record of tenancy is definitely on the increase? Before we put any more legislation on the books dealing with this matter, the whole basic premise of the Government in this field needs careful scrutiny and reexamination. That is the best reason I know of why the rule ought to be voted down now instead of wasting precious time in 4 hours' discussion on a bill that is so monstrous as the bill that appears before us today.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. As a matter of fact, those farmers that are being made tenants are losing their farms because of two things, primarily. One of them is the high rate of interest they have to pay, together with the high taxes; and the fact that they are not given sufficient time to meet those obligations. That is the thing that makes tenants out of these farmers today.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I wonder why the Congress of the United States has been dipping into the Federal Treasury to the extent of $32,000,000 a year to bring the farm interest rate down and then it does not stop foreclosure.

What assurance is there that this bill, amazing as it is on its face, will have any effect whatsoever on that distressed situation in the agricultural life of the country today?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. If we pass legislation charging the farmers no interest whatsoever, but requiring them to pay the principal over a period of years, they would be unable to do so because of the low income that the farmer receives for the things he has to sell. That is the fundamental key to any successful farm program.

In the report accompanying this bill there appears this statement:

The money spent by the Federal Government under this program will not create any new debt, neither will it increase the total outstanding debt of the total farm-mortgage debt of this country one penny. Furthermore, this money is to be repaid with interest to the Government over a period of 40 years during which time no additional debts can be incurred against the tracts of land involved.

It is quite true that the actual farm-mortgage debt will not be increased but what the author fails to emphasize is that under the provisions of this bill every farm mortgage in this Nation which existed on the day that this bill might become a law could be surrendered to the Federal Government for the amount of the mortgage and thus make the Federal Government the largest holder of farm real estate and farm mortgages in the history of all the world.

The bill provides for classifying the lands which are by acquisition added to the public domain so that land unsuitable for farming would remain in the public domain and the land which was suitable would then be sold to original purchasers or other farmers in small tracts. It is apparent, therefore, that it would be entirely possible to accumulate small Federal holdings of timber, submarginal land, and other land unsuited for cultivation over the entire Nation all of which would add materially to the administrative expenses of Government and create an altogether unwieldy situation.

As usual administrative costs would no doubt come out of the Federal Treasury.

It is easily discernible that what would happen under the provisions of this bill would be the transfer to the Federal Government of a large amount of poor mortgaged farms and the loss would ultimately be enormous.

How strange in view of the accent placed on the reorganization bill last year and on the purpose of grouping similar functions of government that there should be before us a bill which seeks to do substantially the same thing now being done by the Farm Security Administration but to place that function in a different department of Government.

The Farm Security Administration in the Department of Agriculture mainly administers the Farm Tenancy Act. This bill would provide for a land purchase and sale program and place it in the Department of the Interior. Can anyone justify that kind of procedure?

The report accompanying this bill also states that "it will tend to check the flood of farm mortgage foreclosures." It is interesting to observe also that in the Democratic national platform of 1940 there is a recital that since 1932 farm foreclosures have been drastically curtailed. If this is the case, then what does one make of the figures which have been submitted in connection with this bill and which, according to the report, were obtained from the official records of the Farm Credit Administration? These figures appear to me to be of such interest that I am appending them where all may read of the foreclosures by the Federal land banks and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation that have been steadily on the increase from year to year. Incidentally this happens to be the case despite the generous amounts which Congress has appropriated to meet this situation. Is anything more persuasive than that this whole matter needs the most careful scrutiny before the country is hurled further along the wrong road?

When all is said and done, adequate prices for farm products will come closer to checking the drift toward tenancy than any other remedy which might be applied. If the author and the friends of this measure wish to do something fruitful in the field of agriculture, they might well turn their attention and their discussion to the field of farm prices and to a program that is designed to check tenancy and make it possible for farmers everywhere not only to hold on to their present possessions but to acquire farms through the means of adequate prices.

It is also interesting to observe that this bill comes to us without any recommendation from the Department of Agriculture or from the Secretary of the Interior.

If the measure in any wise complied with the existing program of the administration relative to farm tenancy, it is fair to assume that some kind of recommendation would have accompanied this bill.

I suggest, therefore, that in the interest of agriculture and in the interest of a sound, sane, and forthright farm program the present rule be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to two confessions: First, the confession of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], that what is ruining the farmer is the high rate of interest and the fact that they are not given sufficient time to pay their debts when depressions come. Then the confession of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN], to the effect that the farmer is being ruined because of the high protective tariff which we should have repealed long ago, because it creates so much spread between the prices of the products the farmers have to sell and the prices of the industrial articles they have to buy. He says the farmers could not make it if they paid no interest at all.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I am sorry, I cannot yield.

If there is anything wrong with this bill, let it be amended when it comes to the floor. At least give us a chance to discuss it. If we are going to save this Republic we are going to have to reestablish the farmers of this country on the land. In order to do that we will have to reduce interest rates. While every big banker, or big insurance company, or power company, or railroad, or manufacturer can get money at a low rate of interest, yet when we talk of reducing interest to the farmers of this country we find the same opposition that we have had to rural electrification. They throw up their hands and yell, "Unsound, unsound." They are always willing to do anything they can for the farmer, provided it does not do him any good.

This measure may not be perfect, but it can be amended. But it seems to me that while we are spending these billions, while we are spending money on everything else, we can well afford to take a few hours to discuss a measure of this kind. If you vote this rule down, of course that ends it; we cannot even debate the measure, much less pass it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] does not need to get excited about the time; it seems to me that we can well afford to take a few hours off to discuss the condition of the farmers of the Nation, the men who toil in the fields, who produce the raw material that feeds and clothes America; the people who sustain the Nation in time of peace and fight its battles in time of war. You will not skip those farmers with the draft. You never skip the farmer when it comes to collecting taxes. As a rule they pay the highest rate of taxes for their incomes of anybody under the American flag. You do not skip them then. Why skip them now?

This money will all come back with compound interest. It will come back with the interest that we charge. It will all be paid back to the Government by these farmers themselves. But it will come back in compound interest in the restoration of stability in this country; in the prosperity of the American farmers and in the billions it will add to the wealth of the Nation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of the time to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, the author of the bill, Mr. PETERSON.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I realize that compared to a number of the Members of this House I am comparatively young in service. This is my first effort as a Member of this House in an attempt to secure favorable consideration of a piece of legislation which directly affects, vitally affects, every citizen of this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely impossible for me to even begin to explain the provisions and the merits of this legislation in the 10 minutes which have been allotted to me. I fully realize that if the leadership on both sides of the aisle, in their hearts and for the most part through their active efforts, are opposed to the granting of this rule, very probably a majority of the membership will go with that leadership.

Mr. Speaker, there is much sound logic in this legislation. If the membership will take time to examine my record during the 6 years that I have been a Member of this House I think they will find that I have been rather conservative in my attitude toward the proposals brought here for consideration. This is not radical legislation. On the other hand, it is steeped in the traditions and the history of this Nation. Although this legislation may not be perfect it embodies the political philosophy which we know as Americanism as contrasted to the various foreign "isms" which have crept in during the last few years.

I shall not attempt to enter into a general explanation of this bill because it is impossible to do so unless you see fit to grant a rule; and, Mr. Speaker, I know of no pressing business for the remainder of this afternoon, or for the remainder of this week. All I am asking of the leadership on each side, and all I am asking of the members of the Committee on Agriculture who see fit to fight, not the bill but the rule, is that you just give us a few hours this afternoon that we may go into the merits of this proposition. Then if you do not like it, vote it down.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Not just now.

Mr. Speaker, the political problem which is approached in this legislation is more clearly set forth in a message sent to this House by the President of the United States, and possibly in fewer words than I could express it myself.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to read excerpts from this message of the President.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. On February 16, 1937, President Roosevelt sent a message to this Congress in which he said:

> I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the report of the Special Committee on Farm Tenancy.
>
> The facts presented in this report reveal a grave problem of great magnitude and complexity. The American dream of the family size farm, owned by the family which operates it, has become more and more remote. The agricultural ladder, on which an energetic young man might ascend from hired man to tenant to independent owner, is no longer serving its purpose.
> Half a century ago 1 of every 4 farmers was a tenant. Today 2 of every 5 are tenants, and on some of our best farm lands 7 of every 10 farmers are tenants. All told, they operate land and buildings valued at $11,000,000,000.
> For the past 10 years, the number of new tenants every year has been about 40,000. Many tenants change farms every 2 or 3 years, and apparently 1 out of 3 changes farms every year. The agricultural ladder, for these American citizens, has become a treadmill.
> At the same time, owners of family-sized farms have been slipping down. Thousands of farmers commonly considered owners are as insecure as tenants. The farm owner-operator's equity in his property is, on the average, 42 percent, and in some of our best farming sections is as little as one-fifth.
>
> When fully half the total farm population of the United States no longer can feel secure, when millions of our people have lost their roots in the soil, action to provide security is imperative, and will be generally approved.
> A problem of such magnitude is not solved overnight, nor by any one limited approach.

Mr. Speaker, I submit there has been but one approach to the problem of farm home ownership during the last 7 years, and that is the approach which has attempted to shackle every farmer coming under its benefits with the irons of regimentation and has attempted to discourage private initiative and the individual effort of millions of farm families in this Nation. What is wrong, what is wrong? Even if I am incorrect in my statement, in our considering for 2 or 3 hours another approach to the problem which for the last 7 years we have considered from but one viewpoint only? Why do the members of the Committee on Agriculture fight so bitterly even the adoption of a rule which will only grant consideration of another approach? In voting for this rule they in no way obligate themselves to support the bill.

Another thing, I was interested in the remarks of my distinguished friend from Illinois, particularly his statement that this is a very vital change from the approach to the farm problem which we have heretofore used. I call his attention to the fact that another distinguished American citizen from the State of Illinois was elected President of the United States primarily upon the political philosophy incorporated in this bill; and I desire at this time, with the consent of the House, to read the platform plank of the Republican Party of 1860, which wholeheartedly endorsed this political philosophy which I am bringing you today. I call the attention of my distinguished friend from Illinois who hails from the State of your great Republican leader, Abraham Lincoln, to the fact that Abraham Lincoln was elected primarily because he advocated the approach to the problem of farm home ownership through the homestead plan. I want to read this plank to you Republicans, for probably you have forgotten it. I think that often you possibly overlook the fundamental philosophy by which you became one of the dominant political parties of this Nation. I read the homestead plank of the Republican platform of 1860:

> 13. That we protest against any sale or alienation to others of the public lands held by actual settlers, and against any view of the free-homestead policy which regards the settlers as paupers or suppliants for public bounty; and we demand the passage by Congress of the complete and satisfactory homestead measure which has already passed the House.

Mr. Speaker, the measure made in order by this rule is simply an amendment to that homestead act making it today operative to help American families acquire farm homestead units just as it did in 1862 when it became the law under Abraham Lincoln.

Members of the Committee on Agriculture seem afraid for this legislation even to be considered here, and I do not know why they are afraid, I do not know why they should hesitate to spend a few hours considering this proposal. They seem to object to it because it had not been before the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, where does the gentleman get the idea that the Committee on Agriculture is fighting his bill?

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I had observed members of the Committee on Agriculture fighting the rule, but I humbly beg the gentleman's pardon if I included all members of the committee in my statement. I am delighted that my distinguished friend from South Carolina is in favor of the rule.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I know that during his 6 years of service in this body the distinguished gentleman from Georgia has been working on this legislation. I hope the House will give him an opportunity to have his bill considered. I hope they will vote for the rule.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. I thank the gentleman.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER. All time has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and there were on a division (demanded by Mr. COLMER)—ayes 47, noes 123.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty-five Members are present—a quorum.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the resolution was rejected.

CLAIM OF GEORGE A. CARDEN AND ANDERSON T. HERD

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up House Resolution 407 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 407

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 7230, a bill to provide for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of the Court of Claims in a suit instituted by George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] to be in turn yielded by him as he sees fit. I now yield myself such time as may be necessary to make the statement I desire to make.

Mr. Speaker, I beg that Members give me their attention while I endeavor to explain the bill which the pending rule proposes to make in order, and I trust that in the event I grow tedious you will have patience with me. I want to say in all candor that in the years I have been a Member of the House I have never appeared upon this floor in the advocacy of a measure which, in my judgment, had more merit than the bill in question.

This is a bill which proposes to amend an act adopted by the House in 1934 conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to pass upon a claim identified as that of Carden and Herd. The bill which it is proposed to bring up for consideration simply provides for the right of appeal to the Supreme Court from the decision of the Court of Claims. I realize that this is the kind of bill which is easily defeated. In the first place, it grows out of transactions that took place in connection with the World War, and, like other Members, I have a natural prejudice against most old war claims. To simply declare that this is an effort to grab something out of the Treasury of the United States, that it is an attempt to steal, is to put it in danger of defeat. Now, bear with me while I attempt to explain the question at issue.

You will recall that prior to our becoming engaged in the World War, foreign boats and ships took refuge in our docks and that there was a disposition on the part of owners to make sales to our own nationals wherever possible. Carden and Herd were ship operators under contract with owners. They were not engaged in the business of buying and selling ships, but in 1917 they did negotiate with Austrian owners for the purchase of 10 ships. A contract was made, which was approved by the Austrian Government and by our own Government.

The President learned of this transaction and directed Mr. Baruch to acquire title to seven of these ships, if possible. Mr. Baruch approached Messrs. Carden and Herd with the view of acquiring title to the ships.

In order to handle this transaction, Carden and Herd had formed a syndicate of New York financiers consisting of seven people. They themselves took a one-seventh interest in the syndicate. They had sold these ships to the syndicate at a very large profit, something around three-quarters of a million dollars. However, as a result of the insistence on the part of the President, they took up with the syndicate the question of canceling the trade, and in the end the syndicate gave consent and the Government proceeded to acquire title to the ships, taking them at the price that Carden and Herd had agreed to pay the owners, which was considerably below their normal value and sale price.

In the negotiations preceding the transfer of the boats, it was agreed between Carden and Herd, on the one hand, and those representing the Government, on the other, that Carden and Herd would be given a contract to operate the ships.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PATMAN). The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill, and we should have a quorum present. There is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Obviously there is not a quorum present.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

CLAIM OF GEORGE A. CARDEN AND ANDERSON T. HERD

Mr. COX. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the Government took title to the ships with the understanding that Carden and Herd would be given a contract to operate them at the prevailing commission charged by such operators. When Carden and Herd surrendered their profits in the sale of the ships and their contract with the syndicate they did not understand they were giving up more than the profit realized by the sale of the ships to the syndicate, which amounted to something in the neighborhood of $750,000. It was their clear understanding that they would operate the ships at the prevailing rate. However, no agreement was ever given them by the Government to carry on those operations, and finally they appealed to the War Department Claims Board, which, after full consideration of the case, after hearing all the testimony, made a finding favorable to the claimants on the facts, but held that the ships not having been acquired for War Department purposes the Board was without jurisdiction to give them relief. The claimants then appealed to the President.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman is certainly mistaken in his assertion, because these two men, who never put up one dollar, received $738,000 from the Government.

Mr. COX. The statement made by the gentleman shows that he is wholly unfamiliar with the record in this case.

Mr. COCHRAN. I will hand the gentleman the decision of the Court of Claims, which quotes it.

Mr. COX. I have the report. I know what is in it, and I know that the gentleman is in error. I am not blaming the gentleman for his zeal in opposing this bill. The gentleman is a valuable Member of this House and renders a wonderful and valuable service to the country. His zeal is commendable. I believe it was Samuel Johnson was said that Goldsmith was a fool for having taken out of his Vicar of Wakefield the line—

I do not love a man who is zealous for nothing.

I think I agree with Mr. Johnson. However, zeal sometimes takes us without the realm of reason, and sometimes when followed blindly results in our doing injustice to people entitled to better treatment.

After the War Department Claims Board held with the claimants on the facts, stating that they were without jurisdiction to give relief, the claimants appealed to President Wilson and he addressed a note to Secretary Baker in which he stated the following, and, mind you, this statement was made upon the basis of the finding of the War Department Claims Board:

MY DEAR MR. BAKER: Having read the enclosed, I am myself convinced that the claim is a just one and my own recollection tallies with that of the writer in respect of everything in which I played a part in the narrative. I leave the matter to your own judgment as to what is equitable and right in the circumstances. My own wish would be that the claim could be paid.

Secretary Baker's term expired before he could take action on the claim. It then fell to Secretary Weeks, who, after examination of the record, made a finding in favor of claimants for $550,000, which he said represented out-of-pocket money. What was that out-of-pocket money? These people in forming this syndicate had spent something in the neighborhood of $400,000, and in the prosecution of the claim they had spent something in excess of $275,000. The Secretary of War held that the $550,000 would in effect represent the money they were out of pocket. He held, however, that he was without jurisdiction or was without authority to pass upon the equities in the case.

Mr. Speaker, this bill comes to us from the Committee on the Judiciary. This committee has on two different occasions taken action upon the questions involved. The chairman of that committee, with other members, is present on the floor prepared to defend the action of the committee in the event the House adopts this rule.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will bear with me just a minute, I shall yield to him later.

In the last report made by the committee we find on the first page the following language:

After two hearings by the Judiciary Committee of this Congress, the committee reached the conclusion, upon the facts found by the War Department Claims Board and those found by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Seventy-third Congress, and by Commissioner Ramseyer—

Formerly a Member of this House—that in furtherance of the rights of these claimants, they should be allowed to have all the facts reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Bear in mind that it is not proposed here that any appropriation whatever be made to remunerate these people, only that they be given the right of appeal from the decision of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court.

After the Secretary of War made his finding of $550,000 to remunerate the claimants for money out of pocket, they came to Congress for relief. The Congress passed a bill conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims, through Commissioner Ramseyer, made a very exhaustive examination of the whole question and made a finding on the facts in line with the findings of the War Department Claims Board, which was a finding in favor of the claimants on the facts but held that the Memorandum of Closing signed by all parties when the Government took over these ships, and the receipt given by the claimants for $550,000, constituted a bar. The Committee on the Judiciary said with respect to the statement that the signing of these documents constituted a bar, the following:

Your committee feels that, if the House in considering the bill upon Report 979 of the Seventy-third Congress, which had all the facts before it, had considered either of these contentions as a bar to this claim, that the committee of the House at that time would not have referred the matter further to the Court of Claims. It is quite evident that the committee of the House at that time did not consider either of these matters as such bar.

This is what your Committee on the Judiciary said; this is what you have said through your committee:

It is quite evident from the record that the decision of the Court of Claims is not in accord with the findings of fact of the War Department Claims Board nor the conclusions of law in that case. With this diversion of opinion and with all the facts easily available by the Court, your committee has felt that it is but just that these claimants should have the right which was omitted from the original act of 1936, to appeal their case as a matter of right to the Supreme Court of the United States, and leave it to that Court to determine the rights and equities in this claim.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman, as we all know, is learned in the law, but can the gentleman cite one instance where the Judiciary Committee ever before set aside the regular procedure and granted to an individual or a corporation a direct appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States rather than going up by a writ of certiorari? I would like to have the gentleman show one such case in the history of this country.

Mr. COX. Here is an attempt on the part of a reputable committee of this House to give to two citizens of the nation the right to have their case determined by a court of competent authority and to pass upon the issues involved.

Mr. COCHRAN. Would the gentleman give to two individuals a right you deny to every other citizen of the United States?

Mr. COX. The Judiciary Committee has stated in its report that this Government gave to aliens rights which thus far have been denied to the claimants in this case.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. About a year ago the Congress passed an act giving litigants the right of appeal under circumstances like these.

Mr. COX. And, of course, they ought to have the right to appeal.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. But at the time this decision was made by the Court of Claims no such right existed and therefore the only way these people can get relief is by this special bill.

Mr. COCHRAN rose.

Mr. COX. I am sorry, but let me proceed.

The committee attaches, as exhibits A and B to its report, the report of the committee made in the Seventy-third Congress and the report of the War Department Claims Board to which reference has already been made.

Now, bear with me, because justice demands that some kind of consideration be given these people and I hope you will not permit the natural prejudice which we have against war claims that I have referred to to lead you into error.

The Judiciary Committee in its first report said, and listen to me, please:

The claims of Messrs. Carden and Herd arise out of a controversy as to the consideration agreed upon for such transfer.

That is, the transfer of the ships.

The committee further said that:

The controversy has never been presented to a judicial tribunal with jurisdiction to adequately dispose of the case on the merits.

At the outset it was presented to the War Department Claims Board under the Dent Act, which, after extensive hearings, found that there was a misunderstanding between the parties and, therefore, no meeting of the minds, that consequently the claimants were entitled to just compensation for their property taken, but that the Board had no jurisdiction to make an award because it did not appear the ships were taken for War Department purposes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. If this bill merely provided that these claimants can appeal to the United States Supreme Court I would be glad to support and vote for it. If this bill simply provides for an appeal to the United States Supreme Court on all questions of law and fact before the Court of Claims, then why do you extend the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court beyond the right to appeal by including the language in line 6?

Mr. COX. To what language has the gentleman reference?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The language in lines 4 and 5 reads: "and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Supreme Court to consider on such appeal all questions of law and fact," and then the bill states in line 6, "including the fair market value of the property involved." Why not strike out the language "including the fair market value of the property involved," so that the bill will simply provide for an appeal on all questions of law and fact which were before the Court of Claims?

Mr. COX. That is an element in the case to which consideration must be given if the purpose is to do justice as between the Government and these claimants.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Was not the value of the property determined in the Court of Claims?

Mr. COX. The decision in the Court of Claims turned on the question of the memorandum made at the time the Government took title to the ships and the receipt given by Carden and Herd to the Secretary of War when the $550,000 was paid, holding that these two writings constituted a bar.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Was not the question of the fair market value of the property before the Court of Claims?

Mr. COX. No; the Court of Claims simply held——

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. WEAVER. May I say to the gentleman from Wisconsin with respect to the findings of fact, and this is one fact you should get into your minds, these parties bought these ships from the Austrian owners. They were interned in New York harbor and could not get out because of the English Navy. Of course, they bought them at a price, $123 per gross ton. Mr. Ramseyer, a former Member of this House, with whom I served for a number of years, was the Commissioner appointed by the Court of Claims to find the facts, and he found himself that these ships were worth $195 per gross ton, and that is in the findings.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Yes; I understand that, but we have been told that this bill simply provides for an appeal to the United States Supreme Court on all questions of law and fact from the decision of the Court of Claims. Then why enlarge the bill with the language in line 6 and set up the Supreme Court as a supercourt of claims, which that language does?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. But the Court of Claims decided the matter on a technicality, and if you go to the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court decides in favor of Carden and Herd, then they would have to pass upon the value of the property.

Mr. WEAVER. The value of the property has been determined twice.

Mr. COX. Let me proceed. The Government took over these ships about 6 weeks before the passage of the act, which would have meant, had title been acquired under the provisions of that law, that Carden and Herd would have been paid the market value of the ships, and at the expiration of the war the ships would have been returned to them intact. In other words, the Government, as a result of taking over these ships, saved itself an expenditure in excess of $20,000,000, which would otherwise have been incurred, and mark you, the Government operated these ships throughout the duration of the war, and for about 2 years afterward, and then sold a part of the lot for a price in excess of the original cost of the entire seven ships. That is in the record.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. In a moment.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. McGRANERY. The record has been made in the Court of Claims?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. McGRANERY. The Court of Claims would likewise show the fair market value of the property at that time, so that under this bill as I read it—

To consider on such appeal all questions of law and fact, including the fair market value of the property involved—

Would in fact say to the Supreme Court, we want you to take new testimony, we want you to take further evidence. I do not know how the Supreme Court is going to set itself up as a court of original jurisdiction to do that.

Mr. COX. The Supreme Court would make its findings on the record made before the Court of Claims.

Mr. McGRANERY. Then why do we not say:

To consider on such appeal all questions of law and fact?

Mr. COX. That is a question that the gentleman might address to the consideration of the Committee on the Judiciary in the event the rule is adopted.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. TABER. According to page 15 of the committee's report, $6,778,006.78 was paid to these people and at that time they executed bills of sale of the ships.

Mr. COX. That is right.

Mr. TABER. The cost to these people of these ships, according to page 9, was $6,476,073. I have not had a long time to examine this, but it looks as if they had been paid more than their cost.

Mr. COX. Let me say to the gentleman that my confidence in him is so great that I have not the slightest doubt in the world, if he will read the record made on the case incorporated in the report of the committee he will support the bill. The gentleman is a fair-minded and just man.

Mr. TABER. I try to be.

Mr. COX. And I know he wants to do justice to everybody. Let me proceed just a little further and quote from the findings of the War Claims Board.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield me just 1 minute?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I realize that I have been very awkward in my endeavor to present this picture to you, but I want to say that if my reputation and standing in this House means anything, I hazard it right now upon the proposition that this is a just and honest claim, and this House ought not for a moment to consider rejecting this rule or turning down the bill which its great Committee on the Judiciary has reported. Nothing less than what the committee has proposed approaches justice in the case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I desire.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 29 minutes.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think we should start off by knowing that this is not appropriating one cent by this Congress. Many on the Republican side have said, What is the appropriation? I think it is important to emphasize that this bill does not provide for an appropriation of one cent. Certain citizens of the United States back in 1917 purchased from a foreign government, with the consent and approval of our Government, because they wanted to register these boats, certain boats. They then formed a syndicate. Soon afterward President Wilson requested these gentlemen to come up to Washington, and he left Barney Baruch negotiate a contract whereby the Government would take over these boats and the contract provided that these gentlemen would be able to operate the boats.

All these gentlemen want to do is to have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States and let them examine the law and the facts in this case. Personally I do not know whether they are entitled to any damages or not. I do not know whether they are entitled to anything, but I know that the other body, without a dissenting vote, felt that they were. Members of the Judiciary Committee likewise feel that they are entitled to damages.

In addition to that, I want to read a copy of a letter that President Wilson wrote to Secretary Baker back in 1921. He said:

MY DEAR MR. BAKER: Having read the enclosed, I am myself convinced that the claim is a just one, and my own recollection tallies with that of the writer in respect to everything in which I played a part in the narrative. I leave the matter to your own judgment as to what is equitable and right in the circumstances. My own wish would be that the claim could be paid.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. And "the writer" was Mr. George A. Carden, one of the claimants on this bill?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. That is true.

So I say that this does not cost the Government one cent. It merely gives these gentlemen the right to appeal, and if they fail to convince the Supreme Court that they are entitled to any damages, those gentlemen have to pay the cost of appeal and all the expenses.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Without any relation to the merits of the case, it is fair to say that in the event the Supreme Court would render judgment in favor of these claimants the Congress would pass an appropriation to pay the bill.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. That is right. But I think if they do find that these gentlemen are entitled to damages that they should be paid.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Does the language of this particular bill go further than giving the Supreme Court the right to say that the Court of Claims was correct when the Court of Claims held that the two memoranda barred recovery in that court? In other words, if the Supreme Court of the United States is of the opinion that the Court of Claims was justified in holding the receipt and finding of the War Board as a bar, could they so adjudicate, or do you enlarge their jurisdiction under the terms of this bill?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I think not.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. If this bill as reported does not enlarge the jurisdiction so as to provide something more than an appeal from the Court of Claims to the United States Supreme Court, please advise the Members of the House why your committee has included the language in line 6, reading as follows:

Including the fair market value of the property involved.

If this is merely an appeal on a question of law and fact, why add to the bill this language, and thereby increase the scope of the bill and the jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court beyond the law and facts which were before the Court of Claims?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. It is not my bill and I would say the gentleman should discuss that with the author of the bill, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will recall from his examination of this whole case that Mr. Baruch, who was commissioned by the President to acquire title to these ships was more indefinite in the testimony that he gave than any of the witness who testified?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. That is correct.

Mr. COX. Mr. Baruch himself said, however:

There is no doubt in my mind but what they did say something to that effect; that "we think we ought to have the operation of these boats." There is not any doubt in my mind that I agreed to that proposition, and I still think so.

He said further:

Of course, they had in mind that they were going to get these ships. They asked me to—I was going to try to get them the ships, but I don't think that you could say that this was what you could call a copper-bound legal kind of a document that you have to get up in real estate, where everybody looks across the table and is scared of each other. I say, as I thought then, and I say now, I thought these men were entitled to it, and I think Mr. Denman had in mind that he was going to get these men the operation of these ships, but as to whether there was anything more definite or anything more legal and binding from a legal standpoint, I am not prepared to say.

Mr. Baruch testified further. Mr. Baruch is the man who was representing the President. He said:

If this had been a private transaction I would go far as to say it was one of these deep moral obligations that a man could not get away from.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman suggested a while ago that this bill represented the views of the Committee on the Judiciary. I want to be clear on that. This was not a unanimous report. Several members were opposed, and I think they are opposed now, but there was no minority report filed.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. But it was recommended by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK. During the last session of Congress, when this bill was before us, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHANDLER] filed a minority report against the bill.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK. I did not want the impression abroad that the Judiciary Committee is unanimously behind this bill, because such is not the case.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I did not say that.

In conclusion, I would emphasize this fact: It merely gives some citizens of the United States the right to go to the Supreme Court because they believe the United States violated a contract made with them back in 1917, and perhaps the best argument in favor is this letter that President Wilson wrote, saying that he thought it was a just claim, and it should be paid.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman conceive of any reason in this world why a citizen who has a grievance against the Government should not be accorded a forum where he could be heard upon both questions of law and fact?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Did the Court of Claims have jurisdiction to pass upon the law and the facts in this case?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Their decision was based on a technicality.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I am asking the gentleman from Illinois—I presume he is a lawyer—I am asking him if it is a fact that the Court of Claims had jurisdiction to pass upon the law and the facts?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I am of the opinion it did.

Mr. HANCOCK. If the gentleman will yield, the Court of Claims did, and wrote a very full opinion in that case.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I asked for 10 minutes on this bill a week or two ago and thought I was going to get it. I cannot make my case in 5 minutes, but will do the best I can.

I probably voted for the jurisdictional bill which sent this case to the Court of Claims. I am told I wrote a letter at one time saying I would support this bill or some other bill. Probably I did; but if I did do it, I wrote the letter before examining the bill and reading the court's decision.

I am not going to vote for this bill. On the contrary, I am going to do everything I can to defeat it.

I congratulate the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. Speaker, for not reporting out the bill H. R. 3356, the original bill. Why? Because in that bill—they could not stomach it—it authorized and directed the Supreme Court of the United States to render judgment for these claimants. Just think of that. Then the author introduced a second bill, and there was a report on the second bill. In the first report on the second bill was a letter from the Attorney General which stated why this bill should not become a law; also a minority report. Why is that letter from the Attorney General and the minority report not in the second report? I would like somebody to explain that in their time. I will place it in the RECORD.

The decision of the Court of Claims tells you just what happened. Carden and Herd got $550,000 from the War Department and signed a statement saying that that was in full and complete settlement of their claim. Then they got $188,000 from Phelps & Co., agents for the Austrian owners, that was paid for removing the restrictions on the ships. In all, they got $738,000; and if you think they did not, read the decision of the Court of Claims. I will place that in the RECORD. Here is what happened:

A few days before we entered the war Carden and Herd conceived the idea of buying these ships. Carden and Herd secured permission from the Government to buy them. They did not put up a dollar. They went to seven men in New York and they formed a syndicate and advanced the money. They were bought about a week before we got into the war.

When the Government took over those ships, less than a month after, they paid them the full value. Remember, they did not have the ships 30 days.

Now, here are two men who had seven people involved besides themselves in the purchase of the ships, getting this $738,000 and keeping every nickel of it, not giving a cent to the seven men who put up the money to complete the deal.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield briefly to my friend from New York.

Mr. HANCOCK. These two claimants were acting as agents for undisclosed principals throughout the transactions.

Mr. COCHRAN. That is true.

Mr. HANCOCK. And they proposed to keep the profits themselves.

Mr. COCHRAN. They did keep them.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. For a brief question. I only have 5 minutes.

Mr. COX. Both these gentlemen are in error.

Mr. COCHRAN. Oh, no. The men who put up the money to buy the ships never received a cent of the $738,000. Read the record.

Mr. COX. But the gentlemen will very likely find themselves embarrassed in making any such declaration as that a syndicate was formed by these two gentlemen to represent undisclosed principals. That is not true.

Mr. COCHRAN. They got the $738,000 and did not give a cent to anybody. Kept every nickel of it, according to the Court of Claims decision.

Mr. COX. The gentleman said the money was put up. The 10 percent that was exacted by the owners in the closing of the contract was put up. The gentleman seems to be interested in creating the impression that this syndicate and these claimants owe the Government when such is not the case. The Government in this instance, as it did in most others, almost compelled the surrender of the contract which had been made.

Mr. COCHRAN. I will tell the gentleman what is involved.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield briefly on this question?

Mr. COCHRAN. No. I regret I cannot. According to the Attorney General, over $8,000,000 is involved in this case, $8,000,000 plus interest that will run it up to about $20,000,000. That is what is involved in this case. Twenty million dollars is involved in this case, according to the letters that are in the first report and in the opinion of the Court of Claims.

If this claim is allowed, who gets it? Do the members of the syndicate get it? Do the seven men who were in this group get it? No; Carden and Herd alone get it, together with attorneys.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. COCHRAN. Briefly.

Mr. COX. The syndicate never operated the ships. The syndicate took the title and gave Carden and Herd the contract to operate them.

Mr. COCHRAN. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, the United States Government taking over seven ships to send our troops abroad and to send our supplies abroad during time of war and letting private individuals operate those ships?

Mr. COX. These were not transport ships in any sense of the word.

Mr. COCHRAN. They were used for that purpose. This is the most foolish proposition I ever heard of. They have nothing in writing to show that any such agreement was made and the Court of Claims points that out. I want to impress upon you the fact that if you adopt this rule the House of Representatives will be virtually passing a bill giving to two individuals in this country a right which you do not grant to anybody else. When you go to the Supreme Court you must do so through a writ of certiorari, and the gentleman from Georgia knows that.

Mr. COX. The gentleman says there is nothing in writing. Does the gentleman find no virtue in the letter of the President in the finding of the War Claims Board and in the finding of the Claims Commissioner?

Mr. COCHRAN. There is no written contract. May I say again to the gentleman from Georgia that I do not think he can lay hands on a piece of legislation giving direct appeal to the United States Supreme Court from the Committee on the Judiciary of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks I include the letter from the Attorney General and the decision of the Court of Claims, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 15, 1939.

Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This acknowledges your request for my views concerning the bill (H. R. 3356) to amend the act entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims of the United States to hear, consider, and render judgment on certain claims of George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd against the United States," approved June 13, 1934.

The act of June 13, 1934 (48 Stat. 1386), which the bill under consideration seeks to amend, is a private act by which jurisdiction was conferred on the Court of Claims to consider the claims of George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd against the United States for additional compensation for several ships which were sold by the claimants to the Government at the beginning of the World War. Thereupon the claimants brought suit in the Court of Claims for an amount in excess of $7,160,000 with interest from May 3, 1917. After a trial on the merits the court reached the conclusion that the claimants were not entitled to recover and dismissed the petition. The present measure proposes to direct the court to render judgment in favor of the claimants for an amount to be determined by the court pursuant to a formula set forth in the bill.

The files of this Department disclose the following facts bearing on the claim:

On April 5, 1917, the claimants purchased seven Austrian ships that had previously taken refuge in American harbors. At the suggestion of President Wilson, conveyed through Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, they resold the ships to the United States on May 3, 1917, at the price that the ships had cost them, plus certain expenses which they had incurred. The total amount received by them from the Government as a result of this transaction was $6,788,006.70. In addition the Government paid them a further sum of $1,053,020 as a consideration for the removal of the restrictions that had been previously imposed on the use of the ships by the Austrian owners, namely, a limitation to navigate between ports of North and South America. The Government turned over four of the ships to the Allies and assigned the other three to the War Department.

Thereafter Carden and Herd asserted that they had understood that as a part of the consideration for the transfer of the vessels to the Government they were to be hired as operating agents of the vessels, and submitted a claim to the War Department on that theory under the provisions of the Dent Act (act of March 2, 1919, 40 Stat. 1272), which conferred on the Secretary of War authority to settle and adjust claims arising out of informal contracts. Mr. Bernard M. Baruch explained that while he had stated that he would recommend to the Shipping Board that Carden and Herd be hired as operating agents for these vessels, if anyone was employed for that purpose, there was no binding undertaking to engage them in that capacity. Secretary of War Weeks on July 16, 1921, made an award in favor of the claimants in the sum of $550,000, which amount was paid to them in due course.

As stated above, a private bill was later passed which was approved on June 13, 1934, conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims over the claim. Suit was then filed pursuant to the permission thus granted for the sum of $7,161,018.30 plus interest from May 3, 1917. The theory of the plaintiffs appears to have been that there was a misunderstanding between the claimants and Mr. Baruch as to the terms on which the ships were being sold to the Government; that consequently there had been no meeting of the minds and no binding contract; and that, therefore, the claimants were entitled to recover the fair and reasonable value of the vessels, which, they asserted, was much greater than the amount that they had received from the Government. Testimony was taken at great length and then the case was submitted to the court on voluminous briefs and lengthy oral arguments. The court passed on the merits of the claim and determined on May 2, 1938, that it was not well founded as a matter of fact and law. A judgment dismissing the petition was rendered. A motion for a new trial was then made by the plaintiffs, and was denied after an oral argument and the submission of briefs.

The bill under consideration proposes to reverse the judgment of the court by legislative action and to direct the court to award just compensation to the claimants, based upon the fair market value of the ships as of May 3, 1917, "which shall be not less than the minimum nor more than the maximum value thereof determined by the War Department Claims Board in the matter of the claim of George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd." The maximum award that could be made to the claimants if this bill were enacted is $7,291,471.30.

It is understood that the claimants contend that they are entitled to consideration on the ground that they sold the ships to the United States at the beginning of the war at cost on the request of President Wilson, assuming that other shipowners would be induced to follow a similar course. It appears, however, that in the case of subsequent acquisitions of vessels by the Government during the World War fair and reasonable value was paid by the United States, and no effort was made to limit the owners to reimbursements of their own cost. The claimants apparently feel that in view of this circumstance they should not be held bound by their bargain.

On the other hand, after a full trial on the merits, the Court of Claims has held that there was no legal obligation on the part of the Government to pay to the claimants any compensation in addition to the amount which they had previously received, to wit, $8,391,028.70. By the award of the Secretary of War they realized a profit of $550,000 on this transaction. They now seek a further profit for which they did not stipulate in their original contract.

As I am unable to find any moral obligation on the part of the Government to pay to the plaintiffs the large profit which they seek to obtain through the pending legislation, I do not feel justified in recommending the enactment of the bill.

With kind regards,

Sincerely,

FRANK MURPHY,
Attorney General.

[In the Court of Claims of the United States. No. 42711. (Decided May 2, 1938.) George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd v. The United States]

Messrs. Charles E. Hughes, Jr., and Herman J. Galloway for the plaintiffs. Messrs. Ellsworth C. Alvord, Floyd F. Toomey, and Frederick W. P. Lorenzen were on the briefs.

Mr. Alexander Holtzoff, with whom was Mr. Assistant Attorney General Sam E. Whitaker, for defendant. Mr. Herbert A. Bergson was on the brief.

This case having been heard by the Court of Claims, the court, upon the evidence adduced, makes the following

SPECIAL FINDINGS OF FACT

1. The plaintiffs are citizens of the State of New York and by an act of Congress approved June 13, 1934, the Court of Claims was given jurisdiction to hear, consider, and render judgment upon any claims, legal, or equitable, of the plaintiffs against the United States involving certain steamships named therein. This act is set out in full in paragraph (1) of the petition which the plaintiffs have filed herein.

2. War was declared between the United States and the Imperial German Government on April 6, 1917. Prior to the declaration of war plaintiffs were engaged in buying, selling, managing, and operating ships in New York City. Due to the existence of the state of war among European nations, German and Austrian ships had been forced to take refuge in the harbors of the United States. Among such ships in the harbors of the United States were 7 of Austrian registry known as the Erny, Lucia, Anna, Teresa, Clara, Ida, and Dora, which are 7 of the 10 ships named in the act referred to in finding 1.

3. About April 1, 1917, the plaintiffs made an offer to the agents of the Austrian owners to purchase the seven ships named above. This offer is set out in exhibit A attached to the petition and is by reference made a part of this finding.

On April 5, 1917, the plaintiffs' offer was accepted in writing. A copy of this acceptance is attached to the petition marked exhibit B and is by reference made a part of this finding.

4. On or about April 7, 1917, plaintiffs sold the seven ships to a New York syndicate composed of seven persons. The selling price of the 7 ships was $140 per dead-weight ton, which amounted to $7,371,140, and part of the agreement between plaintiffs and the syndicate was that plaintiffs should have the operation of the ships and receive 5 percent of the gross freight receipts. The sum of $730,302 was immediately paid to plaintiffs and the balance of $6,640,838 was to be paid upon delivery of the ships. Shortly after the sale to the syndicate, one member of the syndicate withdrew and plaintiffs took over his one-seventh interest.

5. Following the declaration of war, negotiations for the acquisition of these ships by the defendant were carried on until May 3, 1917, between plaintiffs and their attorney, Thomas B. Love, on the one hand and Bernard M. Baruch, a member of the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense, and William Denman, chairman of the United States Shipping Board, under the direction of President Wilson, on the other hand. Shortly after plaintiffs acquired the ships, they made Denman several propositions, none of which met with the approval of the President. The President told Denman, having in mind the scandals that arose out of the Spanish-American War on prices of ships, that he desired the ships obtained from the plaintiffs at the price they paid for them. On April 23, 1917, the President met Baruch and Denman and told them that he wanted Baruch to get the ships for the defendant at the price paid for them by plaintiffs. Denman informed the President that there were certain restrictions on the use of the ships which he thought could be removed by negotiations with the agents of the Austrians. The Presidnt authorized them to get the ships and to have the restrictions on the ships removed.

Thereafter the negotiations were resumed between Baruch and the plaintiffs, in the course of which there was some discussion with reference to plaintiffs having the operation of the ships after the Government had purchased them, and plaintiffs were told by Baruch to go to William Denman, Chairman of the Shipping Board, who would close the transaction.

There is no material conflict as to what was said between the plaintiffs and Baruch at this time, but there is no claim that any contract was then entered into.

6. Plaintiffs and their attorney next went to Denman, and there was further talk between them with reference to the terms of an agreement for the purchase of the ships. After the plaintiffs had made an agreement with the agents for the Austrian owners for the removal of the restrictions on the ships, the negotiations resulted, on May 3, 1917, in the execution of certain written instruments which consisted of (a) separate bills of sale for each of the 7 ships in form, as shown by Exhibit "C" attached to the petition and made part hereof by reference; (b) a receipt signed by the plaintiffs for $6,778,006.70 in payment for the 7 steamers, a copy of which is attached to the petition marked Exhibit "E" and made part of this finding by reference; and (c) a contract signed by William Denman acting for the United States, by each of the plaintiffs, and also by Phelps Bros. & Co., agents for the Austrian owners. This contract was in words and figures as follows:

"IN RE THE SALE OF SEVEN AUSTRIAN SHIPS

"Memorandum of Closing

"1. Closing ships' registers: It is understood that instructions have been given by the Austrian Embassy to the Austrian Consuls at Boston, New Orleans, Pensacola, and New York City that the registers of the ships in those ports will be closed.

"(a) In Boston, on the application of Haight, Sanford & Smith;

"(b) In New Orleans, on the application of George H. Terriberry;

"(c) In Pensacola, on the application of Haight, Sanford & Smith, or John A. Merritt & Co.;

"(d) In New York City, on the application of Phelps Bros. & Co., or Haight, Sanford & Smith.

"The instructions to the Austrian Consuls have been turned over to the Swedish Consuls at these ports, who have been instructed to act for the Austrian officials.

"Immediately upon the payment of the purchase price, Haight, Sanford & Smith are to take appropriate steps for the closing of all registers.

"2. Price: The price to be paid today (May 3, 1917) to Messrs. Carden and Herd is $6,778,006.70, being the price covered by the original contract for restricted trade. There is a balance due from the United States Government of $20 per ton on 52,651 tons for the removal of restrictions, which balance is to be paid as soon as the funds are received from the Treasury Department, which is expected to be on or before May 5, 1917.

"3. Steamship Clara, New Orleans: This steamer is now in the hands of the United States marshal. Messrs. Phelps Bros. & Co. agree to have bonds filed immediately for the release of the ship.

"4. Provisions, stores, supplies, bunker coal, etc.: It is agreed that all provisions, stores, supplies, bunker coal, etc., on board all ships shall be inventoried and appraised by parties to be agreed upon by Mr. Donald and owners' agents, the Government to pay to Messrs. Phelps Bros. & Co. the value of the same.

"5. Personal effects of officers and crew: It is agreed that necessary instructions will be issued, either by the Treasury Department or by the Shipping Board, for the landing of all personal effects of officers and crew still on board the vessels; the said effects to be turned over to the agents of the Austro-Americana as follows:

"At New York City, Phelps Bros. & Co.
"At Boston, Patterson, Wylde & Co.
"At New Orleans, A. K. Miller & Co.
"At Pensacola, Gulf Transit Co.

"6. Repairs of damages: Phelps Bros. & Co. agree to hold in this country $700,000 to cover the obligations under the sales contract, to pay the cost of repairing willful damage above $25,000 per ship. A surveyor appointed by Phelps Bros. & Co. shall be allowed to survey all repair work while being done.

"7. Remittances: Such portion of the purchase price as is to be remitted to the owners is to be deposited for remittance to the credit of the Austro-Americana Line. In the event that there shall hereafter arise any difficulty in connection with the remittance of any part of the said $700,000, held in this country as above, Mr. Denman, Chairman of the Shipping Board, agrees to use his influence to facilitate said remittance.

The testimony is very conflicting as to what was said at that meeting, but the evidence fails to show that there was any contract or part of a contract entered into between the parties at that time or at any stage of the negotiations other than as is shown by the written instruments above referred to and set out.

A few days thereafter the defendant paid to the plaintiffs the further sum of $1,053,020 for the removal of the restrictions on the ships. The plaintiffs turned this money over to Phelps Bros. & Co,. who in turn remitted the sum of $188,000 to plaintiffs. Denman, having requested that the plaintiffs furnish information as to their ability to operate the ships and the personnel of their organization, on May 6, 1917, plaintiffs wrote a letter to Denman, the first paragraph of which reads, in part, as follows:

"To the end of carrying out our understanding that at a price such as would be fair and acceptable to other competent shipping concerns, we should have a contract for the charter or operation of the Austrian ships which have been transferred to the Government, we beg to say that in our organization, among others, are the following persons: etc."

The letter further contained information, which had been requested by Denman, as to the ability of plaintiffs to operate the ships and the personnel of their organization.

The operation of the seven ships was never granted to the plaintiffs, though demand therefor was made immediately after the transfer of the ships and frequently reasserted during the period of defendant's ownership.

7. The plaintiffs presented to the Secretary of War under the act of March 2, 1919, commonly known as the Dent Act, a claim against the defendant for $7,500,000 based on the transfer of the ships as set forth above and (1) the failure of the defendant to turn the ships over to the plaintiffs for operation; (2) that at the time of the transfer of the ships there was no meeting of the minds between the parties to the contract; and that therefore plaintiffs were entitled to the difference between the fair market value of the ships at the time of their delivery to the defendant and what the defendant had paid to the plaintiffs. The War Department Claims Board denied relief.

8. The plaintiffs took their case to the Secretary of War, John W. Weeks, who, on July 16, 1921, made an award in favor of the plaintiffs in the sum of $550,000. The award and acceptance of plaintiffs are as follows:

"A claim having been presented under the act of March 2, 1919, commonly called the Dent Act, by Messrs. George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd, based upon an agreement under which the United States acquired title to seven ships.

"Now, by virtue of the authority in me vested by said act, I do hereby award to the said Carden and Herd, in full adjustment, payment, and discharge of said claim, exclusive of prospective profits, the sum of $550,000, and I hereby find and declare that no subcontractors are interested in said claim.

"And I hereby direct that the sum of $550,000, awarded as aforesaid, be paid to the said Carden and Herd out of the unexpended balance of any appropriation available for that purpose.

"(Signed) JOHN W. WEEKS,
"Secretary of War.

"Dated July 16, 1921, Washington, D. C.
"Accepted at Washington, D. C., July 18, 1921.
"(Signed) GEORGE A. CARDEN.
"(Signed) ANDERSON T. HERD."

Pursuant to the award, the sum of $550,000 was paid by defendant to the plaintiffs.

9. The seven ships cost the defendant as follows: $6,778,006.70 purchase price paid on May 3, 1917; $1,053,020 cost of removing the restrictions on the ships; $550,000 awarded to the plaintiffs by the Secretary of War; and $815,000 expended to place the ships in a seaworthy condition, or a total of $9,196,026.70.

The first and third items above, to wit: $6,778,006.70 and $550,000, or a total of $7,328,006.70, were for and paid to the plaintiffs.

10. The dead-weight tonnage of the seven ships at the time of their transfer to the defendant was as follows:

Name of ship and dead-weight tonnage:

Erny	9,250
Lucia	10,500
Anna	2,075
Teresa	6,500
Clara	6,050
Ida	7,350
Dora	10,550
Total	52,275

CONCLUSION OF LAW

Upon the foregoing special findings of fact, which are made a part of the judgment herein, the court decides, as a conclusion of law, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, and it is therefore ordered that their petition be dismissed.

Judgement is rendered against the plaintiffs in favor of the United States for the cost of printing the record in this case, the amount thereof to be ascertained by the clerk and collected by him according to law.

OPINION

GREEN, Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in this case seek to recover $7,161,018.30 with interest from May 3, 1917, or a total of about $16,000,000, as just compensation for ships owned by them and taken over by the Government during the World War.

It appears from the evidence that on April 5, 1917, the plaintiffs acquired by purchase seven Austrian ships which had taken refuge in American harbors. About April 7, 1917, the plaintiffs sold these ships to a New York syndicate. The defendant wanted these ships, and negotiations were commenced for their purchase by the Government through Bernard M. Baruch under the direction of President Wilson. On ascertaining that the ships had been sold to the syndicate, Baruch requested the plaintiffs to get the sale to the syndicate rescinded, having previously informed plaintiffs that the President had expressed a desire to obtain the ships at the original cost price. Plaintiffs complied with the request made by Baruch and obtained a recission of the sale to the syndicate. Thereafter, the negotiations were resumed between Baruch and the plaintiffs, and Baruch told them to go to William Denman, chairman of the Shipping Board, who would close the transaction. Accordingly, plaintiffs met Denman, and after some preliminary conversations the plaintiffs executed a bill of sale to the defendant for each of the ships and signed a receipt reciting that they had received $6,778,006.70 in payment for the seven ships and had executed and delivered to the United States bills of sale therefor, the receipt being executed without prejudice to the further payment of $20 per ton for the transfer of the vessels free of restrictions in the trade. At the time of the execution of the bills of sale there was also executed by Denman, the plaintiffs, and Phelps Brothers & Co., agents, an instrument denominated "Memorandum of Closing," which recited that the price to be paid for the ships was the sum stated above, and that there was a further balance of $20 per ton to be paid by the Government for the removal of restrictions on the ships and certain minor details of the transactions relating to the closing of the registers of the ships, including what was to be done with stores and supplies, repairs, and a payment to the original owners of the ships. (See finding 6.) Shortly thereafter defendant paid the further sum of $1,053,020 for the removal of the restrictions on the ships, and has paid nothing since except $550,000 as an award which will be considered further on.

So far we have recited matters as to which there is no dispute. The plaintiffs allege in their petition that they transferred title to the ships to the United States with the distinct understanding that part of the compensation to be paid them for the transfer was the operation of the ships by them at the prevailing rate of commission, which was 5 percent of the gross freight receipts, that the United States has denied that the operation of the ships by the plaintiffs was a part of the compensation, and took and used the ships without the plaintiffs ever having received just compensation therefor.

The defendant enters a general traverse of the allegations of the petition and in argument contends that there was no other consideration for the sale of the ships than the price paid therefor; also in substance that the plaintiffs had no reason to understand or believe that they were to have the operation of the ships after they were sold; and finally, as a matter of law, it is argued that the written instruments signed and delivered by plaintiffs at the time the ships were purchased constitute the sole and only contracts between the plaintiffs and the defendant for the purchase of the ships and cannot be varied by oral testimony as to any understanding on the part of plaintiffs.

More specifically stated, the contention of the plaintiffs is that the negotiations for the sale of the ships resulted in a "mutual misunderstanding" as to the consideration for the sale, and that by reason of this "mutual misunderstanding" the minds of the parties did not meet and no valid contract was made.

The respective counsel do not agree as to what took place in the course of these negotiations and a large portion of the briefs filed in the case is devoted to a review of the testimony introduced. There is no substantial disagreement as to what was said between Baruch and the plaintiffs, but there is a direct conflict in the evidence as to what occurred when plaintiffs and their attorney took up further negotiations with Denman. Plaintiffs have the support of the greater number of witnesses but the surrounding circumstances tend strongly to support the testimony of Denman. We do not think it is necessary to determine this conflict by making a finding of fact as to the understanding of either plaintiffs' or defendant's agent, for under our view of the law applicable to the case the testimony introduced on the part of the plaintiffs is inadmissible to vary or nullify what we hold is a written contract, the terms of which are not in dispute.

The term "mutual misunderstanding" seems to involve a contradiction. We have found no opinion, decision, or textbook in which the expression is used. There are many cases where a mutual mistake occurred with reference to some element of the contract upon which the parties sought an agreement. If both parties had a mistaken belief as to some fact which was a necessary element of the contract, the mistake was thereby mutual. In such event, it is obvious that the minds of the parties never met and there was no contract. But in the instant case the allegation that there was a "mutual understanding" is based upon the claim that the evidence shows that one party believed or understood that the contract included a certain matter while the other party did not so understand or believe. We think such an understanding or belief is not mutual and merely shows that the parties disagree as to the terms of the contract. If the theory expressed in the argument of plaintiffs is correct, then whenever there was a disagreement between the parties as to whether a contract had been made, or as to the terms of a contract, and the parties each had a different thought or belief concerning these matters there would be a "mutual misunderstanding" which would invalidate the contract; but this situation nearly always occurs when there is a conflict as to the terms or construction of a contract. Such a rule would make written contracts of little avail. In our view, a misunderstanding as to the contract does not differ essentially from a mistake in relation to it and must be governed by the same principles, that is, it must be mutual in the sense we have used the word above in order to nullify an otherwise valid contract

It should be said at this stage of the consideration that it is contended on behalf of plaintiffs that there was no complete and definite written contract, but we think a reading of the instrument headed "Memorandum of closing" makes it so clear that this document constituted a complete and definite agreement that neither discussion nor argument is needed on this point. This written agreement fixed the price to be paid for the ships in plain and unambiguous terms—in other words, fixed the consideration for the sale of the ships; and the oral agreement which plaintiffs claim they understood to have been made is clearly in contradiction with this writing. Taking this fact and conclusion as a basis for further consideration of plaintiffs' case, it will be found that the decision thereon must be controlled by certain well-defined principles.

In determining the issue in the case it will be observed at the outset that plaintiffs do not allege in the petition that a contract was in fact made for the operation of the ships. Indeed, they do not even allege that they had reason to believe that there was such a contract from what was said in the negotiations. Nor is it now argued or claimed that the testimony shows that a contract for the operation of the ships was entered into. If such a contract were shown, the plaintiffs would then have merely an action for the recovery of indefinite prospective and contingent profits, which cannot be maintained. The plaintiffs' action is somewhat peculiar in this respect (and we think it will appear also in other respects) in that they base their right to recover not on the actual making of a contract, but merely on their alleged misunderstanding of it accompanied, as they claim, by a different understanding by the other party. The petition seems to be carefully drawn to avoid this dilemma, and in argument counsel for plaintiffs make no contention that any oral contract for the operation of the ships was agreed to by defendant.

It should also be observed in this connection that there being no oral contract made for the operation of the ships, the defendant's agents did not in fact misunderstand the contract between the parties and the defendant does not allege or assert any understanding or misunderstanding. The defendant's counsel simply deny that any oral contract was made and pointing to the written contract insist that it is the only contract and all of the contract which defendant made. If the plaintiffs in the negotiations gave defendant's agents to understand that their proposition of sale included the operation of the ships and defendant's agents either accepted this proposition or used language giving the plaintiffs reasonable ground to understand it was accepted, then the oral contract was made, but this is not the case before us as presented by either party. What we have here is a written contract in connection with which plaintiffs allege they understood there was an oral agreement. Defendant denies the existence of such an agreement and plaintiffs make no claim that it was made but contend that the minds of the parties have not met and the written contract becomes invalid. If a written contract can be vitiated in this manner, then all that is necessary to be done in order to break a contract in writing is for one party to claim and testify that he understood that there was an additional oral contract upon which the written contract depended. Then, when the other party rests its case on the written contract, a "mutual misunderstanding" can be pleaded and the written contract held invalid although it is perfectly plain and unambiguous in its language.

A separate oral agreement may be part of the consideration or inducement for a written contract. We so held in McCloskey v. United States (66 C. Cls. 105), but in that case the preliminary oral contract did not conflict with the written contract which the parties had entered into and the clear implication of the case is that the oral contract could not stand if it had varied the terms of the written agreement. There is nothing in the decision to indicate that if the plaintiffs had merely thought the oral contract was made, when it was not in fact made, this situation would have any effect upon the written contract. There would be nothing left of the doctrine that written agreements cannot be varied by oral testimony and that all previous negotiations are presumed to be merged therein if, when a written contract was executed, it were held that it should be set aside merely because one party understood or believed that there was a further oral contract forming part of the consideration of the written contract or preliminary thereto.

The rule for which plaintiffs contend is, in effect, that when a written contract is entered into and nothing else is agreed, but one party believes that there was an oral contract preliminary to the written contract, this fact, if proved, invalidates the written contract. With this doctrine we cannot agree and we find no authorities that sustain it.

None of the decisions which are cited by counsel for plaintiffs support the contentions made as to the principle which must control. They were made upon different facts as to which a different rule applies. It is not necessary to review all of them but there are two upon which the plaintiffs specially rely. The case of Turner & Otis v. Webster (24 Kans. 38), relied upon largely by plaintiffs, merely lays down the rules that when the agreement is made by parole and ambiguous language is used which the parties understand differently, no binding contract has been made. In Vickery v. Ritchie (202 Mass. 247), there was a mutual mistake which invalidated the contract and the court held that this failure of the express contract did not prevent the application of an implied contract to pay for property furnished and used. In the case we have before us there unquestionably was a written contract made as to which there was no misunderstanding. The question is whether the understanding or belief on the part of plaintiffs—if proved—that there was an additional oral contract made, vitiates the written contract and leaves the parties with no contract at all. We are clear that such is not the rule.

Finally the argument made on behalf of plaintiffs lays special stress upon a statement found in section 71 of the Restatement of the Law of Contracts. It is as follows:

"(a) If the manifestations of intention of either party are uncertain or ambiguous, and he has no reason to know that they may bear a different meaning to the other party from that which he himself attaches to them, his manifestations are operative in the formation of a contract only in the event that the other partly attaches to them the same meaning."

If his statement is considered in connection with what precedes and the plain meaning of its language applied, it will be seen that it has nothing to do with any situation in the case before us. It is made under the following heading:

"UNDISCLOSED UNDERSTANDING OF OFFERER OR OFFEREE, WHEN MATERIAL

"Except as stated in sections 55, 70, the undisclosed understanding of either party of the meaning of his own words and other acts, or of the other party's words and other acts, is material in the formation of contracts in the following cases and in no others: [Statement (a) set out above then follows.]"

From this heading it will be seen that the subject matter being considered was when the undisclosed understanding of one party was material in the formation of a contract. Here it is contended that an undisclosed understanding will destroy a written contract. Moreover, the preliminary facts stated in paragraph (a) set out above are not claimed to exist in the instant case by either party.

Having reached the conclusions as to the law in the case which have been stated above, it follows that the testimony upon which the plaintiffs rely to void the written contract is inadmissible for that purpose, and consequently, as stated above, we do not find it necessary to determine and set out in the findings what either plaintiffs or defendant understood.

What we have said above is sufficient to dispose of the case but it may be that something should be added with reference to the claim presented to the Secretary of War by plaintiffs against the defendant for $7,500,000. This claim was made under what is called the Dent Act and set up the same matters that are now made the basis of plaintiffs' suit; namely, the failure of the defendant to turn the ships over to plaintiffs, and that at the time of the transfer of the ships there was no meeting of the minds between the parties to the contract and therefore plaintiffs were entitled to receive the fair market value thereof less what had been paid. The War Claims Board denied relief but on July 16, 1921, the claim having been presented to the Secretary of War, John W. Weeks, he made an award in favor of the plaintiffs in the sum of $550,000. The award recited that it was made in "full adjustment, payment, and discharge of said claim, exclusive of prospective profits." The plaintiffs, as in the present case, had made no claim for prospective profits and the Dent Act forbade an award for such profits. The plaintiffs signed an acceptance of the award and the $550,000 was paid to them. Testimony was offered with reference to statements afterwards made by Secretary

Weeks, who was not living at the time the testimony was introduced. This testimony cannot be received to vary the award and the acceptance for several reasons, but it is argued any finality the award may have had has been destroyed by the special jurisdictional act. We think the closing provision of the act plainly contemplates that the court shall determine whether the claim of plaintiffs was "satisfied by the subsequent payment by the Secretary of War as an accord and satisfaction." That it was satisfied, we have no doubt. Attention is called to the fact that the award excluded prospective profits and there is much discussion as to the authority of the Secretary of War under the Dent Act and speculation as to what was the basis of the award he made. It is not necessary to consider any of these matters. The plaintiffs presented to the defendant, through the Secretary of War, a claim in substance and effect the same as that which they now make and upon which they seek to recover judgment. The plaintiffs were paid and accepted a certain sum in full payment and discharge of their claim. We think it is entirely immaterial what the Secretary of War had in mind when he made the award and that any irregularity in the proceedings, if there was any, does not change the result that the plaintiffs' claim was satisfied.

The defendant sets up as an additional defense a claim that the evidence shows that plaintiffs were paid all the ships were fairly worth in the market at that time. The conclusions we have stated above make it unnecessary to determine this question of fact. In this connection the defendant offered evidence which it is claimed showed that the plaintiffs were given the operation of other ships from which they derived a large profit. We think this evidence was properly excluded by the commissioner of this court, and in any event it is not necessary that we should determine any question arising thereon. The evidence, however, does show that the defendant paid the plaintiffs the original cost of the ships to them with a very liberal allowance for expenses and the plaintiffs also received from Phelps Bros. & Co., out of what the Government paid for removing the restrictions on the ships, $188,000. In other words, it appears that the plaintiffs realized a profit out of the transaction of $738,000. The amount of this profit is not material to the decision of the case, and we only mention it because in the oral argument some claim was made that the plaintiffs had not been treated fairly by the Government. The defendant contends that the plaintiffs originally contemplated a patriotic sacrifice of profits in accordance with the desire of the President, but afterward changed their minds, and that this was the only misunderstanding in the case. But this also is not material to our decision.

It follows from what has been stated above that the plaintiffs' petition must be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

Whaley, judge; Williams, judge; Littleton, judge; and Booth, chief justice, concur.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I have paid some attention to this matter, and I believe the rule should be adopted.

The facts in the case have been rather ably covered by Members who have spoken before. These claimants bought these ships, or contracted to buy them. The statement has just been made that they did not pay a dime of their money; but I refer to the hearings on H. R. 16203, page 91, where it is recited that it was found by the commissioner of the Court of Claims that the claimants paid approximately 10 percent of the proposed purchase price, which was transmitted by the plaintiffs with the offer.

As far as the syndicate is concerned, after the claimants contracted to buy the ships, they did in fact make an agreement to turn them over to the syndicate, or to sell them to the syndicate, and they made that deal at a considerable profit. Subsequent to that time the Government of the United States said to these people: "We want the ships. You shall sell them to us; we need them." Thereupon the syndicate released these two claimants and their rights under the contract and they got out of the picture. Now, then, there was a misunderstanding between these people and Mr. Baruch, who finally concluded the deal, as to what the deal was. That was what was found by the commissioner of the Court of Claims, and I think that has been found by every committee that has considered the matter.

The fact of the matter is that the claimants thought they were to get the price that they had agreed to pay for the ships, plus a contract of 5 percent for operating the ships. This would have run into a considerable amount of money.

Why would they have given up their deal with the syndicate under which they had a fine profit and an arrangement for operation and turn the ships over to the Government, except that they expected a fair return to come to them as a part of the consideration? The only other reason that I can conceive of for turning them over to the Government would have been a patriotic motive, and I think there was an element of that in the case; but beyond that it does appear from the record that there was not a meeting of the minds. Therefore, they could not recover the 5 percent; but under the law, if there was not a meeting of the minds, then clearly the Government should pay these people the fair market value of the property acquired.

Mr. McGRANERY. Who is going to get this money, the claimants or the syndicate?

Mr. HALLECK. The claimants get the money if this bill passes and the Supreme Court finds in favor of claimants.

Mr. McGRANERY. The syndicate is out?

Mr. HALLECK. I do not yield further.

Mr. Speaker, evidently the Congress of the United States, when it passed the first authorization bill in 1934, recognized that the situation was about as I have pointed out. The case came on for trial before the Court of Claims as authorized by the act of Congress. The Court of Claims referred the matter to a Commissioner who has made a finding, a part of which I have referred to. I think, on the facts as found in that report, the facts were found about as were contemplated by the Congress when it passed the authorization bill and upon which facts it seems clear the Congress expected the claim would be paid. In other words, I think the Court of Claims or the Commissoner found the facts were such as the Congress had in mind when it said, "We want this determined to learn whether or not these claimants should be paid."

What is the effect of this bill? As I understand, it is simply to bring about a review of the judgment on the law and the facts of the Court of Claims by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States will review this record and if it finds and believes that under the law and the facts these claimants are not entitled to recover, they will not recover; but, on the contrary, if the Supreme Court finds that under the facts the claimants are entitled to recover, then it would be authorized to find judgment and to enter judgment for the plaintiff.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time on this side to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be considerable misunderstanding about this matter. At the outset may I say the claimants here involved are Judge Carden, of Texas, and Mr. Herd, of my own congressional district. I do not assume you will find any finer citizens anywhere than these two men.

My friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] is certainly very much in error in his statement. In the first place, these boats were bought by Carden and Herd at a total cost of about $123 a net ton, and I want the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] to realize that it is not true a syndicate bought them. The record shows that Carden and Herd bought them and that is shown in writing. Mr. Herd gave his check to the owners of these ships for the down payment. Soon after that Carden and Herd gathered together five or six other men and formed a syndicate. After that syndicate was formed the written record shows that Carden and Herd sold these ships to the syndicate for $140 a ton, reserving the right to operate them.

There were 52,000 tons, which meant a net profit of over $700,000. Futher, Carden and Herd were not so much interested in buying and selling ships as in operating ships, and they had contracts to operate these ships between North and South America. So they got an agreement from the syndicate not only to pay them $140 a ton but 5 percent of the gross operating revenues from the operation of the ships during the life of the ships. There it is. Carden and Herd had a contract in their pockets from substantial businessmen for $140 a ton and in addition thereto had the right to operate those ships at 5 percent of the gross returns.

Then the World War came along and we were needing ships and more ships. Mr. Denman, the Chairman of the Shipping Board in Mr. Wilson's administration, sought to make arrangements to get these ships from Carden and Herd.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. If I have a case in the Court of Claims and believe I have been wronged, and have lost $5,000,000, why should I not have the right sought to be given these claimants? Why should not this bill be amended so that every man who has a grievance in the Court of Claims shall have the right to appeal directly to the Supreme Court?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. When this matter was decided by the Court of Claims there was no law that would permit Carden and Herd to appeal to the Supreme Court at all. Since that time, however, about a year ago, we passed a law giving litigants the right to appeal. Since there was no such law at that time, the only way Carden and Herd can have an appeal to the Supreme Court is by means of this special bill. The present general law will take care of cases mentioned by you.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. If the gentleman will yield, the law simply provided for a writ of certiorari.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I cannot enter into all that discussion now.

Mr. Denman made arrangements tentatively for the Government to take over these ships from the syndicate, but Mr. Wilson, for some reason, objected to dealing with the syndicate. It was then that Carden and Herd and the syndicate rescinded their contract, and Carden and Herd paid back to the syndicate every dime the syndicate had put into the proposition, with 6 percent interest. It was only about a year ago, after these people had fought through all the different boards and courts and had put their claim before the Congress, that some lawyers here in Washington raised all this trouble, claiming that the syndicate should get the money; when we have in the record writings and other evidence showing that the syndicate surrendered every claim it had in this matter, and Carden and Herd at the same time gave up their right to $140 a ton and to the 5 percent of the gross operating return and let the Government have these ships for around $128 a ton, but with the further understanding that they were to have from the Government the right to operate the ships. They yielded $12 a ton, about $700,000, when they let the Government have these ships, but they never did yield the right to operate the ships.

Read Mr. Denman's statement. Mr. Denman swore that when he went out of the Shipping Board the one thing he regretted he left behind unsettled was this matter of Carden and Herd. Mr. Denman also stated that although we took ships from the Germans and others during the World War, as we took them from Carden and Herd, the Government allowed everybody the fair market value of their ships except Carden and Herd. Are we going to treat two honorable American citizens—patriotic citizens—differently than we treated the Germans and others in the World War?

This claim is right. Everybody that has touched it says it is right. President Wilson said it was right, Barney Baruch said it was right, Mr. Denman, of the Shipping Board, said it was right, and the War Department Claims Board said it was right, but that it did not have the jurisdiction to take care of the matter. Secretary of War Weeks said it was right, but he could not go far enough under the law. Mr. Ramseyer, one of the ablest lawyers that ever served in this House, said it was right. Yet the Court of Claims threw these folks out on a technicality.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. Did not the Court of Claims find that neither Carden nor Herd had any legal claim?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. On the question of this technicality, what is the technicality? The title to these ships was in certain Austrian citizens. When the transfer of title from the Austrians to the United States Government was made, the document was signed by the Austrian representative, by Mr. Denman, and by Carden and Herd. The question was raised then about the 5 percent—by whom? A good lawyer, Mr. Thomas Love, their lawyer, who later became Assistant Treasurer of the United States. They all agreed that it did not belong in that memorandum of closing. However, the Court of Claims decided the case on the technicality that you could not introduce that outside proof, you had to go by that writing. The case should be allowed to go to the Supreme Court of the United States and heard and decided on the facts and the law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-five Members are present, not a quorum.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 205, nays 101, not voting 124, as follows:
